Mr. MUNDT. I think I can best answer that by quoting from the report of the Secretary of the Interior found on page 3 of the committee report accompanying the pending bill. This statement came to the committee in the form of a letter. It was on the basis of this evidence that the committee unanimously reported this bill to the House. I quote:

> Neither the agreement nor the ratifying act contains any provision, express or implied, authorizing disposal of the lands in any other manner, or for purposes which would net no return to the Indians. The plain language used precludes any other interpretation.

I think that probably answers the gentleman's question, that the Government acted illegally in so conveying the land.

Mr. JOHNS. Yes. I think the Indians did have a right to bring an action against the United States Government.

Mr. MUNDT. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. In just a minute, if the gentleman will permit. I want to say in substantiation of the situation prompting the question asked by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS] that there is no agreement with the Indians under which we can take an acre of this land. There is no question about the equities of the situation. There is no question, either, but what this is a white man's legislature and that we can vote them down; nor is there a question but what in justice and in equity the Indians are entitled to a settlement on the basis of the evidence before our committee.

I now yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. Is there any suit pending in the Court of Claims for this identical amount of money filed on the part of the Indians?

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If the gentleman will permit, I will answer that there is not.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. There is no suit pending. There never has been a suit pending with reference to this matter.

If I may say one more thing, the statement was made here some time ago that there are many suits pending before the Court of Claims involving large sums for the American Indians. Even so, I believe it is unethical to penalize this particular Indian tribe, because there may be many suits brought in the Court of Claims. It is just as unethical for us to do that as it was for the red man decades ago to punish white men who never engaged in a massacre.

Mr. DONDERO. But the point I was making was whether or not there was any claim filed on behalf of this tribe.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. There is not.

Mr. MUNDT. I think the answer to the gentleman's question is that there is not.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, these gentlemen are making some very fine speeches, but I would like to use some of my time myself. [Laughter.] Yes; I yield briefly to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. I simply wanted to state that the only reason I mentioned the suits, and it was not in connection with this bill, but because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] brought the question up, and I simply stated the reason I was opposed to Indian bills. I did not bring it up in connection with this bill. I want this to be perfectly understood by the House. This is not a jurisdictional bill but one authorizing an appropriation.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Just to keep the RECORD straight on this matter of Indian claims aggregating $2,000,000,000 now pending in the Court of Claims of the United States: I hold in my hand a docket of the cases pending in the United States Court of Claims in the month of December 1939. These claims now total the sum of $381,572,573.33 instead of $2,000,000,000; and according to the rate of recovery in past cases the recovery would be about 1½ percent of the claim.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from South Dakota 2 additional minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from South Dakota 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. MUNDT. I would like to read another passage from the same letter from the Secretary of the Interior establishing the justice of this claim. He states:

> The fact remains, however, that the consideration so far received by the Indians—a little more than $12,000—spread over a period of nearly 40 years, is grossly inadequate for the surrender of their rights in more than 230,000 acres of land.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a difficult thing to serve on the Indian Affairs Committee, representing at best some 350,000 citizens of the United States, most of them coming from a few segregated States, and in some of those States restrictions having been established so that the Indians do not vote. It is a difficult thing to get legislation through, because all we can depend upon is the establishment of a just and equitable claim. Even if we are successful this afternoon in convincing those who are now in the assemblage of the justice and equity of the claim, can you not see the difficulty confronting us when it comes to the matter of voting, when there is no longer an adequate opportunity to present the evidence? The Members come rushing in to vote, and somebody suggests, "Here is a chance to save some money. This is an Indian bill."

I think it may be conceded that the Indian Affairs Committee is conducting itself rather graciously thus far in not asking that a quorum be present, but we hope you who are here will talk to the Members who come in late so that they may see the justice of this particular claim. It is not a question today of saving money or spending money. It is a question whether we are going to deprive the Indians of this money which belongs to them.

Mr. Chairman, the American Indian was deprived of his home and hunting ground by the white man in the first instance, and it is our solemn obligation to treat him with justice today as he struggles manfully to fit himself into the white man's society. There is no danger that we shall ever overpay the Indian for the manner in which we have taken from him that which he held most dear. It is important, however, that we give serious consideration to legislation such as this which is intended so far as is possible to rectify past injustices and to increase the opportunities confronting the Indian population of today.

As a member of the Indian Affairs Committee, I have had the opportunity to devote considerable personal study and research to the Indians' problems. I know that the American Indian of today is a splendid, patriotic type of citizen, and that the Indian youth of this country are rapidly training themselves to become genuine economic assets in this Nation, as they take their places in industry, in agriculture, and in the professions. Let us deal with justice and generosity to these red brothers of ours who, after all, are the real Americans. There would have been no Indian problem had we not taken the Indians' paradise away from them. It is only just, therefore, that we now make amends by giving the full measure of justice and humanity to the Indians who, in the final analysis, have been the victims of our avarice and not the beneficiaries of our charity.

The only proposition advanced in opposition is by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], and he has repeatedly stated that the President vetoed a similar bill, therefore he might veto this bill. Everyone in this Chamber knows that the President of the United States has never been accused of not being willing to change his mind. He has changed his mind, I believe, more frequently than most of the citizens of our communities have been able to change their clothes during the depression of the New Deal. I want to give him an opportunity to reconsider this bill, in view of the evidence which is now available. Perhaps someone gave him bad advice. In the first place the bill is different from the one which he vetoed previously. I would not be willing to condemn the President in advance like the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN], and say he is going to veto a bill which will give some degree of justice to the aboriginal citizens of this country. I want to give the President a chance to demonstrate that on second thought the President may correct the injustice he has admittedly wrought upon the American Indian, and that he will give adequate consideration to this bill. If he does I believe he will change his mind now in the direction of justice and equity and sign this legislation if it passes.

It is true and it cannot be denied as it has been repeatedly stated on this floor today, and no man has challenged the accuracy of the statement that if President Roosevelt had not vetoed this bill the last time it passed, the Indians of Arizona would, today, be enjoying the benefits of this justice-providing legislation. However, the President vetoed this bill which was passed only after so much hard work on the part of Congress and the Indians are consequently today denied the use of the money to which they are rightfully entitled. To correct the President's error, we must pass this legislation. It is to be hoped the President will give the Indians a fair break this time but, at least, it is all that we can do now to offset the unhappy results of President Roosevelt's previous veto.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. MILLER. Is there any reason why the State of Arizona should not pay for the valuable lands it has taken?

Mr. MUNDT. The State of Arizona has taken but a very small portion of this land. Most of the land that has been taken was taken illegally by the Federal Government for water-hole areas which are now owned by individual cattlemen in that country.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MUNDT. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This land taken by the State of Arizona is lieu land, was taken instead of school land which the State of Arizona was entitled to under the organic act creating the State of Arizona, but it was not entitled to Indian land. The Federal Government had no authority to use the Indians' land to discharge its obligation.

Mr. MUNDT. It is the valuable water holes which comprise the crux of the whole matter. This is grazing land and, of course, without water the grazing land is worthless. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT].

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to know very much about Indian affairs. I have always considered Indian bills on the Consent Calendar and those which we have considered on the floor of the House in the same manner I would consider bills affecting any class of our American citizens. The Indians have been made citizens by law in most instances and have the vote the same as other American citizens. They have very elaborate tribal organizations, most of which are represented here in Washington by either a chief or headman, and they have done a very fine job in presenting their cases to the Congress.

During the 6 years I have studied the Consent Calendar, upon which most of these Indian bills are placed, I have come to the conclusion that most of them are claims originating from treaties, and that the failure on the part of the Government to pay the claim is a contractual question. In other words, we are called upon to determine whether there has been a breach of contract between the Government and the Indians.

In the instant case it seems to me we have a clear-cut issue of whether there has been a violation of the contractual relationship between the San Carlos Apache Indians and the Federal Government. In studying the contract between the Government and the Indians, we find that they entered into the agreement on February 25, 1896. Article I of that agreement provides as follows:

> That the said Indians do hereby cede, grant, and relinquish to the United States all right, title, and claim which they may have in and to all the land embraced within the following-described tract, now a part of the said San Carlos or White Mountain Indian Reservation, to wit.

Then follows a description of the land ceded, granted, and relinquished to the United States.

Let me emphasize that all right, title, and claim to that land was ceded, granted, and relinquished to the United States Government. In consideration of that granting, that relinquishment, and that ceding, the United States Government undertook certain obligations, which are expressed in article II, as follows:

> That in consideration of the lands ceded, relinquished, and conveyed, as aforesaid, the United States stipulates and agrees to place in the Treasury of the United States to the credit and for the sole benefit of the said Apache, Mohave, and Yuma Indians, and to account therefor annually to them through their agent, the net proceeds accruing from the disposal of such coal and minerals lands, lying within the ceded territory, under the laws applicable thereto; and that said money shall be paid to them in cash from time to time as the same shall become available, pro rata, share and share alike to each man, woman, and child of the tribes now living upon and entitled to the privileges of the said reservation.

Therefore the Indians ceded to the Government this land, and in consideration of that the Government agreed to pay the Indian tribes certain sums for coal and mineral lands as they are disposed of. The consideration for the ceding of the land for all purposes—homestead, school, and everything else—is the payment to the Indians annually for distribution to the members of the tribe of moneys received from the coal and the mineral lands disposed of.

The Secretary of the Interior says there cannot be put any other interpretation on this agreement than that the Indians ceded and relinquished and conveyed to the Federal Government only the mineral and coal rights. I believe the language of the contract is open to some other interpretation, an interpretation which I believe any lawyer Member of this House would place upon it and any court would place upon it. Therefore, the only question we have to consider here now is whether the United States has lived up to its contract and, if the United States has not lived up to its contract, then what damages may be assessed or stipulated for the failure of the United States to live up to its contract.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is a lawyer, and he is a good lawyer.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The gentleman is too good a lawyer, however, to try to say to the Members of this House that a guardian who has been ceded in trust certain property from a ward, with the understanding and the obligation that the ward shall be paid the returns the guardian gets from the property ceded to him is thereby given the right to give away a great deal of the property and dispose of it in any way he sees fit, without any determination of whether there are mineral rights on the land that goes to the State or the land that goes to the national forest or anywhere else. The gentleman is a good lawyer and knows very well that no guardian has a right to dissipate the property of a ward in any such fashion.

Mr. WOLCOTT. If a trust relationship was contemplated, I believe the lawyer drafting this agreement would have said, "The said Indians do hereby cede, grant, and relinquish to the United States in trust all rights, title, and claim." But the agreement does not say that they are establishing a trust estate or are ceding this land to the United States Government in trust. So I still say this becomes a question as to whether the United States has violated its contract with these Indians.

I grant you that under other laws there is a strong presumption that the United States Government is the trustee of all Indians, but this is an agreement which must stand on its own feet as far as the determination of any damages is concerned.

What damages have they suffered? It is claimed that the Federal Government, in violation of this agreement, ceded certain lands for certain purposes. According to the bill, we are to deduct $12,433.63 received by the Indians "as royalty under mining permits." According to the Acting Comptroller General of the United States, this money represents the net proceeds from a sale by the United States land office at Phoenix, Ariz., of four tracts of land containing 160 acres each within the involved area at $20 an acre.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I presume that refers to this much-considered land upon which there is some water, the most desirable land. If the Indians have any claim against the Government for a violation of this agreement, alleging that the United States had no right to deed these lands for any other purpose than the mining of coal or other purposes named specifically as a part of the consideration in the grant, then their claim is against the United States Government for the depreciation of the value of all the land involved due to the usurpation by the Federal Government of the choice portions of the property and cannot be compensated for in the manner expressed in this bill. That is a question for the Court of Claims of the United States to decide.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. If the gentleman will turn to page 6 of the report, in the second paragraph he will find this language, and I will ask the gentleman if he considered that when he said this land was not deeded in trust:

> The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to negotiate with the Indians on the San Carlos Reservation, Ariz., through an inspector, for the cession or relinquishment to the United States of the lands embracing the coal fields.

That is all the act of Congress provides—that the Government shall make a contract with the Indians extending to coal lands only.

Mr. WOLCOTT. The ceding clause is article I of the agreement.

Mr. BURDICK. It was an act of Congress authorizing us to go out there and make a contract.

Mr. WOLCOTT. What the gentleman has just read has to do with what I discussed as a part of the consideration for the ceding, relinquishing, and granting.

This is what the Comptroller General of the United States has to say about it, and I agree with the conclusions he has come to. On page 6 of the report the acting Comptroller General of the United States says this:

> It is clear from the terms of the agreement that the United States is not legally obligated to pay the San Carlos Apache Indians for this land, except as sales of parcels thereof may be made from time to time.

We have already paid them $12,433.63 for the land sold. I repeat that if the Federal Government had no right to sell that land, then the claim is against the Federal Government for the usurpation of that right. If this trust relationship which we hear so much about is involved in this question at all, it seems to me the Court of Claims should have before it the question of a breach of trust and the damages attending such breach of trust, rather than have the matter of the interpretation of a contractual relationship brought to the Congress for decision.

It has been said that this money cannot be distributed to the Indians except by act of Congress. That may be right. But if the Congress does not distribute this money to the Indians, then the Government is guilty of a breach of this agreement because the agreement specifically provides—

> And that said money shall be paid to them in cash from time to time as the same shall become available, pro rata, share and share like to each man, woman, and child of the tribes now living upon and entitled to the privileges of the said reservation.

You cannot have your cake and eat it, too. You cannot say that this is for the benefit of the tribe and not say that it is for the benefit of the individuals. If it is for the benefit of the individuals, there should be a set-off here against any amount which these individuals or the tribe itself may owe the United States. Therein lies, I believe, the gist of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer, and it may be that I could scarcely follow the intricacies of the argument of the gentleman who has just preceded me. I want to call attention to the fact that this bill takes up the matter from an entirely different angle—not a legalistic consideration of a contractual matter, but a matter of simple justice to Indians and whites. You are thinking of the previous agreement entered into in 1896 with these Indians, wherein they were to receive payments or royalties for coal. We will admit that twelve-thousand-and-some-odd dollars has been paid to the Indians, but that is all they have received. This bill proposes to pay the Indians for certain land, because it is a part of their reservation and has been taken away from them by white settlers, leaving the remaining area without water and therefore useless.

I do not care to go into the legal aspects of it at all. I shall simply say to you that valuable land has been taken from the San Carlos Indians. The Government has been responsible for this passing into private hands and more than 10,000 acres of it was probably worth $50 or $100 an acre as timbered land. Valuable land has been ceded to the State of Arizona as lieu land, and I want to remind you again that the organic or enabling act for Arizona of June 20, 1910, provided that four sections in every township, the second, sixteenth, thirty-second, and thirty-sixth, should be set aside for public-school purposes. That was an act of Congress, and if any of those sections had passed to private ownership, the State might select lieu lands. The State has done that. It has gone right into this particular tract and selected school lands. Now, such school land cannot be valued at less than $3 an acre, and under these circumstances it must be worth a great deal more than $3 an acre.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Yes; briefly, for a question.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not a fact that page 4 of the committee report contains this language from the report of the Secretary of the Interior:

> It is believed $1.25 per acre would adequately compensate the Indians for the cession. This figure has been used as the minimum figure at which the value of ceded lands should be placed.

Should we send this matter to the Court of Claims, we might double or triple the cost to the Treasury by reason of the United States embezzling these trust lands. We will also have additional expenditures which are necessary to defend the case and furnish reports from the various departments, which would be no small amount.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I thank the gentleman. Certainly that is not only possible but probable. We can settle this thing in justice to the Indians by passing this bill as it is, or we can turn this bill down and run a very great chance of being out a lot more by having to pay out of the Treasury for the very things that the gentleman from Wisconsin mentions.

Mr. Chairman, I beg the Members of this Committee to give this matter their most earnest consideration and a favorable vote.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. I beg the Members of this Committee to ment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, as payment in full to the San Carlos Apache Indians, at the rate of $1.25 per acre for 232,320 acres of land ceded by them under the agreement of February 25, 1896, ratified by the act of June 10, 1896 (29 Stat. 358), less $12,433.63 received by the Indians as royalty under mining permits, the sum of $277,966.37 to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the San Carlos Apache Indians, and to be available for expenditure for the benefit of such Indians: Provided, That none of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be subject to the payment of any claims, judgments, or demands against the San Carlos Apache Indians accruing prior to the approval of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

> Page 1, line 6, after the word "Indians", strike out "at the rate of $1.25 per acre."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN: On page 2, in line 3, after the word "of", strike out "$277,966.37" and insert "$33,725."

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, in the President's veto message of last August he stated:

While I would not favor legislation that would provide for a payment to the Indians of $1.25 per acre for this remaining acreage, I would favor its restoration to the Indians.

My amendment carries the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget in the original bill. If the amendment carries, I shall move to strike out section 2, which is also objectionable to the President, according to his veto message.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if you adopt the pending Cochran amendment, you give this bill a kiss of death.

The committee report and the record in the case indicates that these Indians ceded the land in question to the United States. The United States had possession of this land in trust as guardian for the Indians. The agreement under which the Indians ceded the land to the United States as trustee provided that they ceded the land for mineral exploitation only. The report of the Secretary of the Interior, as well as uncontroverted evidence before the Indian Affairs Committee, indicates that Uncle Sam has unjustly deprived his Indian wards of their valuable property rights without due process of law which we talk so much about when praising the benefits, rights, virtues, and glories of our constitutional democracy. Right now and here is the time to act as well as talk about these sacred privileges of our constitutional democracy, and we can do so by voting down the pending amendment.

As I read, when the author of this bill, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK], kindly yielded to me, the Interior Department indicated that the minimum value of this land, the entire amount of land ceded by the Indians for mineral exploitation, was $1.25 an acre. It is now proposed, although the Department admits that the value of the entire tract was $1.25 an acre, by the gentleman from Missouri to pay $1.25 an acre for the valuable portion of the land, which the Government, in violation of law, used for school-land grants, power sites, water reserves, national forests, and homestead entry. Mr. Chairman, that is manifestly unfair and unjust.

Furthermore, if this Congress, when it finds money due to our Indian wards, would have the courage to make appropriations and rectify the wrongs which the Government has committed, it would be in the interest of economy. One of the opponents of this bill advocated that we send the matters which it covers to the Court of Claims. It costs many thousands of dollars to defend a suit before the Court of Claims, and many thousands of dollars to prepare the reports which are necessary when these Indian claims bills are considered by the Court of Claims. Furthermore, when we have the facts before us, the uncontroverted facts, that Uncle Sam has robbed his Indian wards, when the Indian Bureau admits it, when the Secretary of the Interior, a member of the President's Cabinet, admits it, I do not think that this Congress should adopt this amendment and cut the heart out of the bill in the name of standing by the President. I feel confident that the President, when all of the facts are presented to him, will not hesitate a moment to sign the bill to remedy some of the wrongs and help restore Uncle Sam in the eyes of the Indians to a better position than that of an exploiter, a hijaker, and a robber of his Indian wards.

I sincerely hope, without respect to party affiliations, that the Members of this Congress will oppose the pending amendment and vote for the bill, which was favorably reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with a unanimous vote after thorough consideration. Let us resolve here, irrespective of party politics, to give these Indians a square deal and send this bill to the White House. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] cannot trust his own President, that is no reason why we should hesitate to send the bill to the White House. If the President is opposed to it, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] states, then he need not worry about it, because the President will tomahawk the bill, as the gentleman from Missouri is trying to do with his amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] would change the amount in the bill and reduce it to about $33,000. Manifestly $33,000 is not an adequate price for 232,000 acres of land. Of course, the mover of the amendment is really not trying to pay for it all, but for just that portion which has passed to private ownership. It is a ridiculously small amount to pay for that, as the valuable parts have been taken, including the sources of water. If this amendment were adopted, it would mean that the rest of the land should be returned to the Indians, returned dry, without water, worthless. It would be checkerboarded with white holdings, decreased in value by such a move. Surely the Congress would not be guilty of perpetrating that sort of wrong on our American Indian or upon white settlers among them. As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] said, I feel that the President was ill-advised in one respect in regard to the other bill, but I also feel that the President will sign this bill as is if we do not amend it. I ask you to vote down the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 24, noes 39.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLCOTT: Page 2, line 6, after the word "provided", strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That before the deposit of the amount so appropriated to the credit of the San Carlos Apache Indians the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to ascertain and deduct therefrom the total gratuities theretofore paid to such Indians of the character provided for set-off by section 2 of the Second Deficiency Act, 1935 (49 Stat. 596)."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, this amendment merely authorizes the Comptroller General to set off against any payments which might be made to the Indians any sums which the Indians might owe to the Federal Government. It has been quite customary to so provide in Indian bills, and so far as I know there are few, if any, Indian bills ever passed by Congress including the proviso on page 2, whereby money may be paid to them without regard to any of the moneys which they owe to the Government. As a matter of fact, under the agreement with the Indians, it was provided that none of the money—credited to said Indians under this agreement shall be subject to the payment of any claims, judgments, or demands against said Indians for damages or depredations claimed to have been committed prior to the signing of this agreement.

So if we want to be consistent and carry out the terms of this agreement, and if we rely upon this agreement for any equities that might be found in this bill, then, of course, we must conclude that the proviso on page 2 is a gross inequity so far as the Federal Government is concerned. We at least should treat the San Carlos Indians the same as all other Indians are treated; and under the general laws of the United States, as expressed in the second Deficiency Act, there must be offset against any sums due to the Indians these gratuities which previously have been paid to them. Now, that is only fair and just. It is not only fair to the contract relationship but it is also only fair to the taxpayers of this Nation that these Indians who have received gratuities should have them set off against indebtedness of the Government due them. Some people on relief in the States have to put up any security they have against the day when they might reimburse the State and possibly the Federal Government for gratuities advanced to keep body and soul together. So why should we treat one class of our citizenry any different than another class of our citizenry? The Acting Comptroller General has suggested an amendment in the very language of the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I yield.

Mr. MUNDT. The gentleman is offering what purports by the amendment to increase the degree of equity offered by this bill. I am wondering, if the amendment were adopted by the committee, whether the gentleman from Michigan would join in supporting this piece of legislation.

Mr. WOLCOTT. No; I would not. It is my duty as a Member of Congress to perfect legislation against the mistakes that others might make. [Laughter.]

Mr. MUNDT. Does not the gentleman think it is equally important to give equity to the Indians by passing legislation, the same as in your instance you are attempting to give equity to the white man by amending it?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Are the Indians taxpayers?

Mr. MUNDT. They are.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Are they citizens?

Mr. MUNDT. They are.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Then why should they be put in any other category than you or I or any other taxpayer? I am trying to protect the large body of taxpayers against the granting of any favor to any particular group of taxpayers. That is all I ask you to do.

If I owe the Government money, why should not the Government have the right to offset my indebtedness against anything the Government owes me? With respect to the veterans—and you are all veteran minded—we compelled a situation which would allow the Federal Government to deduct any claim the Federal Government had against a soldier before he could get his bonus or any other compensation. I know, because they had me charged with $26 for some equipment that I lost somewhere in the mud of France. That is how I happen to know that the veterans had to reimburse the Government for any lost property. Why should not the Indians reimburse the Federal Government for gratuities furnished them? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the main purpose of the amendment is to encumber the legislation so that it would not amount to anything, because the gentleman has admitted that he would not vote for it even if we adopted his amendment. The fact remains that if this matter of gratuity is to be applied to Indians, the matter has to go before the accounting department, and the case that required the shortest time in the history of the Government for accounting was 6½ months, and the longest case was 6 years and 8 months. So you can take your choice about how long that will be.

The second reason I am opposed to the amendment is that this Congress in 150 years has refused to define what a gratuity is. There have been bills before this Congress for 10 years, to my knowledge, defining gratuity, but they have never come out of committee.

I want to treat the Indians in no better way than the white people, but I am certain of one thing—that if anybody had taken half of Michigan away from the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] and his friends for nothing, you would have heard more about it than you have heard in this Congress about this bill. We want to treat them alike. When we grant aid to the poor, the W. P. A., and one thing and another, that applies to all citizens alike. We have received in North Dakota probably the highest rate of any State in the Union. South Dakota was next, not because of their representation in Congress but because those States were hard hit.

Now, if you do not understand what a gratuity is you will charge to these Indians all the relief money that all the people of the United States had the benefit of. There is no definition to prevent it. You will simply scuttle this bill if you amend it this way.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And if they want to be fair, they would have to take the value of the land at the time of the taking by the United States and include interest going back over all those years. If you wanted to be fair in the matter, and if you are going to deduct offsets, that would have to be considered also.

Mr. BURDICK. That is right. Now, whenever the Indians have received any money from the Government, directly paid to them for their benefit, I am willing to have that deducted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the legal definition of the word "gratuity" a gift? Is that not what a gratuity is, as defined by the courts and as defined by Webster's Dictionary?

Mr. BURDICK. That is my understanding of it; yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And is it fair to charge up these people with something that the United States has given them as a gift?

Mr. BURDICK. The gentleman is right. As an example, I want to explain to the gentleman that many Indian tribes in this country who never received a dollar of benefit from any gratuity have been charged up with the same. I have in mind the Osage Indians, who were charged with $2,000,000 for services of the Government performed for the benefit of other Indians. There is no regulation as to gratuity at all.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. If we adopt this amendment, would it not be putting this Congress in the position of playing Santa Claus at Christmas time and then sending the recipient a bill the day after Christmas?

Mr. BURDICK. Now you have it, now you do not.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Except there is constantly a controversy with respect to what constitutes a gratuity. I call the gentleman's attention to the wording of the amendment:

> And deduct therefrom the total gratuities theretofore paid to such Indians of the character provided for set-off by section 2 of the Second Deficiency Act, 1935.

In the Second Deficiency Act of 1935, I am advised, that gratuities are explained and identified and characterized. So there is no controversy as to what will constitute a gratuity under the terms of this amendment.

Mr. BURDICK. They never have been defined. I can pick 11 different cases in the Court of Claims and find 11 different decisions as to what constitutes a gratuity. This Congress has never defined a gratuity in any legislative act which definition could be applied to all cases.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. The gentleman from Michigan sometime ago said something about one group of taxpayers exploiting another group of taxpayers. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that American Indians are citizens. Some of them, however, are on reservations and are wards of the Government. The San Carlos Indians are of that character. This being the case, we cannot regard the situation as that of one group of taxpayers trying to raid the Treasury and exploit all the rest of the taxpayers.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOLCOTT) there were—ayes 39, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 2. The lands referred to in the first section of this act are hereby reopened to location and entry under the public land and mineral entry laws of the United States.

Committee amendments:

> Page 2, line 13, strike out "public land and."
> Page 2, after the word "States", in line 13, insert the following: "and, subject to existing valid private rights, are returned to and made a part of the public domain for administration under the Taylor Grazing Act of June 28, 1934 (48 Stat. 1269), as amended and supplemented."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. COOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7551) authorizing payment to the San Carlos Apache Indians for the lands ceded by them in the agreement of February 25, 1896, ratified by the act of June 10, 1896, and reopening such lands to mineral entry, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I can qualify, and I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman qualifies.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WOLCOTT moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 2, line 6, strike out all the remainder of the paragraph after the word "Indians."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WOLCOTT) there were—ayes 39, noes 48.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present, and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members; and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 143, not voting 119, as follows:

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Commitee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on Monday next to take up for consideration House Joint Resolution 407, which has just been reported, and that there shall be not to exceed 12 hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand this represents an agreement between the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Massachusetts, who happens to be absent from the Chamber at the moment.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Between the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and myself, and this agreement was concurred in by the full committee. It is a unanimous agreement.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. You are going to try to get a vote on Friday of next week?

Mr. DOUGHTON. We hope to.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, is this the reciprocal trade agreements bill?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES OF CANDIDATES FOR HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 344

Resolved, That a special committee of seven be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to investigate and report to the House not later than January 3, 1941, the campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the House of Representatives in both parties, or candidates of parties other than or independent of the Democratic or Republican Parties, the names of persons, firms, associations, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the methods of collection and expenditures of such sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influences, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in necessary legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the House of Representatives.

The investigation hereby provided for in all the respects above enumerated shall apply to candidates and contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaigns of the general election in 1940, or any special election held prior to January 3, 1941. Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information which in its judgment may be reasonable and reliable. Upon complaint being made before such committee, under oath, by any person, persons, candidates, or political committee setting forth allegations as to facts which, under this resolution, it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after hearings on such complaints, the committee shall find that such allegations in said complaints are immaterial or untrue.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the adjournment of the Congress, and that said committee or any subcommittee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties as prescribed by law.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO MAKE ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1941

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 32

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, is authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 20th day of January 1941.

CLAIMS OF THE ASSINIBOIN INDIANS

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 2776) conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Assiniboin Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, several million dollars are involved in this bill, and I think the bill ought to be considered in Committee of the Whole. I object to the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 2776, with Mr. COOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is entitled to recognition for 1 hour. Permit the Chair to inquire whether any minority member of the Committee on Indian Affairs is opposed to this bill?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I am, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire recognition in opposition to the bill?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to recognition for 1 hour in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 1 hour in support of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, under the treaty of Fort Laramie in 1851, the Assiniboin Tribe had title to a reservation of some 6,477,940 acres. The Government took all of this land from the Assiniboins without compensating the tribe. Suit was brought in the Court of Claims, but was dismissed because the gratuity and other offsets exceeded the value of the land, which was first fixed at approximately $3,250,000. The purpose of the present bill is to reinstate this suit, exclude certain offsets, and raise the land damages to 93 cents per acre. The committee has amended this to read $1.25 per acre, less cost of survey and sale.

If enacted, the bill would probably give the Assiniboins a chance to recover about $2,000,000.

There has been no prior payment on this claim. Gratuity and treaty expenditures to the Assiniboins are shown in the report of the General Accounting Office, filed in the Court of Claims suit.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, while the hour is getting late, I hope the Members will indulge us in a fair discussion of this bill. I have been a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs since I came to the Congress. This is the third call since then the Committee on Indian Affairs has had on Calendar Wednesday to have the Members of the House consider bills affecting the rights of the Indians. Owing to parliamentary procedure, a sample of which we saw here this afternoon, solely for the purpose of delay and to prevent consideration of Indian bills, we have been able to consider only four or five bills affecting the rights of the Indians of this country, except those on the unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. Chairman, as was said here earlier in the afternoon, we are dealing with a subjected race. They are involuntarily as subjugated people. The relationship of guardian and ward has been imposed upon these people, and the Government of the United States has assumed the position of looking after them. Remember, also, that the fee title to every acre of land the Indians are in possession of throughout the United States is in the United States Government. It is held in trust for the Indians, so to speak.

Now, going back to 1851, the United States Government was trying to find a way to the Pacific coast; in other words, to extend the western border of the civilized portion of this country as far west as the Pacific coast. They found along the line, as they were proceeding west, in such territories as are involved in this bill, many Indian tribes in possession of land. Some of them were warlike, some were peaceful, and the United States Government attempted, in order to settle up that country and protect the white men that found their way into that country, to induce the Indians to enter into treaties, and so forth, with the end in view of having peace between the white men and the Indians. These treaties primarily were made for the benefit of the white men. As an illustration of what I am talking about, the first Governor of Montana, Thomas Francis Meagher, called upon the United States Government to make a treaty—this was back in 1860, I think it was—with the Crow Indians, and he used this language, in substance, to try to make a treaty with the Crows to protect the thousands and thousands of men and women who were going into that western country to make homes for themselves upon lands and to develop the mining interests of that country.

This was what the treaty was for. The Government proceeded to the job of treating with the Crows, and what is true of the Crows is true of every other tribe in that country, including the tribe that is involved in the bill before us. So I want the Members of the House to bear in mind that these treaties were made at the request of the United States Government and those treaties should be carried out, and the piece of land involved in this case is land that was granted to the Assiniboin Indians by reason of the Fort Laramie Treaty of 1851.

Let me quote from the letter of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior as to just what happened with reference to the piece of land I am talking about:

> In 1851 the Assiniboin Tribe, along with other tribes, entered into a treaty with the United States, known as the Fort Laramie Treaty, in which the Government set aside a reservation of some 6,477,940 acres to the Assiniboin Tribe.

Remember this was done in 1851; in other words, the United States Government goes out there and finds out what these Indians have and then because they were powerful enough to do it, they say, "We will set aside for your benefit and for the benefit of the people who are to follow you 6,447,940 acres," out of their own territory, and grabbed the rest.

> Some years later, beginning in 1868, the United States took all of this reservation from the Assiniboin Indians without payment of any compensation.

Beginning in 1868 the United States took all of this reservation from the Assiniboin Indians without payment of any compensation. This is an admission and a statement by the Interior Department as to what happened.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No; not now. I will yield to the gentleman later on.

Now, bear in mind the fact that this land was taken from the Assiniboin Indians without pay or without compensation and contrary to the Fort Laramie Treaty of 1851.

Now, in 1927 Congress authorized the Assiniboin Indians to commence an action before the Court of Claims to recover the reasonable value of the 6,447,940 acres.

I may say that what I am going to state now is technical involving the jurisdictional acts.

The jurisdictional act provided—

> That jurisdiction be and is hereby conferred upon the Court of Claims, with right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, notwithstanding all lapse of time or statutes of limitations, to hear, examine, and adjudicate, and render judgment in any and all claims arising under or growing out of the Treaty of Fort Laramie of September 17, 1851.

You will observe that this jurisdictional act, passed and approved March 2, 1927, dealt only with an express violation of the treaty-owned land and the treaty rights of the Assiniboin Indians in and to this land as fixed by the Fort Laramie Treaty.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes more to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask my friend from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] to come here and help me hold this map.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad to render any assistance that will throw light on this subject to the gentlemen who are to vote upon it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Now, here is the Missouri River running in this direction. We are now in the State of Montana on this map. Here is the treaty land of September 17, 1851, which is bounded on the north by the Missouri River, on the south by the Yellowstone River, and you will notice here at this point the famous Powder River, connecting up with the Yellowstone River, and here is the Missouri, and here is the Musselshell River, flowing into the Missouri River at this end of the treaty land. This is the land in this territory, approximately six and a half million acres, in the shaded portion of the map involved in this bill. That is the land that was involved in the suit originally brought to recover in the Court of Claims under the original jurisdictional act. It was discovered after the suit was brought that the Assiniboin Indians claimed this land north of the Missouri River by immemorial possession; in other words, that they had had it for nearly two centuries, and had been in possession of it, and they wanted pay for it.

As a matter of fact the Federal Government recognized the rights of the Indians in and to the lands north of the Missouri River, because it paid them in the neighborhood of a million dollars for this land, and then divided the land between the Blackfeet Indians, the Fort Belknap Indians, the Sioux Indians, and the Fort Peck Indians. When that fact was discovered Congress then, in order to give these Indians their day in court, said, "Yes, we will extend that jurisdiction to the right to fight out the claims for the land north of the Missouri River as well as for the treaty-acquired land south of the Missouri River," and passed a second jurisdictional act which contained the following language:

Resolved, etc., That in any action pending or hereafter brought under the provisions of an act entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Assiniboin Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1927, jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the courts therein named and in the manner therein defined to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment for any damages resulting from the appropriation by the United States to its own use or to the use of any other Indian tribe by the treaty of October 17, 1855 (11 Stat. 657); between the Government of the United States and the Blackfeet Nation and other Indian nations therein specified, and/or the act of Congress of April 15, 1874 (18 Stat. 28), of any land, title to the occupancy and use of which was in the said Assiniboin Indian Nation by immemorial possession and the rights or claims to which land the last paragraph of article V of the treaty of Fort Laramie of September 17, 1851, expressly provided, the Assiniboin Nation did not abandon or prejudice; and if the said courts shall find that any such lands of the said Indians were so appropriated they shall award damages for the land so appropriated as provided in the said act of March 2, 1927:

This jurisdictional act, involving the recovery of land north of the Missouri, contained this provision—and this is significant, and I ask the Members of the House to bear the language in mind:

That if the court shall award damages for land appropriated by the said treaty of 1855 and/or the said act of Congress of 1874, the United States shall be allowed credit for any sum or sums paid the Assiniboin Indian Nation under the act of Congress of May 1, 1888.

It will be seen that this provision limited the offsets for recovery for the land north of the river to a violation of the rights of the Indians subsequent to the Fort Laramie treaty, dated in 1851. They did not go back to the Fort Laramie treaty of 1851 at all—had nothing to do with it. Here was a separate tract on one side of the river that the Indians claimed by immemorial possession, brought in in a separate paragraph in the amended complaint under the second jurisdictional act, and here was the original suit brought under the first jurisdictional act, involving recovery for the land south of the Missouri River, title to which was established in 1851 by the Fort Laramie treaty. There was no connection whatever between the two causes of action. A trial was had before the Court of Claims. The court found that the Government of the United States had appropriated six and a half million acres of land belonging to the Assiniboin Indians, and that they were entitled to certain set-offs with which we agreed, but further found that the Assiniboin Indians failed to prove by a preponderance of evidence that they had title by immemorial possession to the land north of the river and set off over $1,000,000 against the claim for lands south of the river which had no connection at all and in express violation of the terms and conditions and instructions of Congress in the second jurisdictional act.

That is what this bill is about. The Court of Claims violated absolutely the express instructions of Congress. Remember this, that the Court of Claims is simply the judicial agency of this body. It has only the powers that Congress gives it. It must obey the instructions of Congress. If it violates those instructions, then it is not performing the duty that Congress directed; the duty of Congress to the Indians throughout the United States, because it is the only forum to which the Indian may appeal, is a continuing one at least until justice is finally done. My distinguished friend the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST] will argue that you have had your day in court and the matter is res adjudicata. My answer to this is, first, that it is not res adjudicata; second, if it were, it makes no difference, because the Congress of the United States is the defendant in the action. It is the only representation the Indians have. It is the only place where the Indians may sue. The President of the United States has nothing to say about it. You are the guardians; you are the defendants in the suit brought by the Indians. You may waive the defense of res adjudicata in any court if you wish.

Mr. GILCHRIST. No one disputes that.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then why all this argument?

Mr. GILCHRIST. You can waive anything.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Furthermore, I think I can tell the distinguished gentleman that it is not res adjudicata, for this reason: The court found that the land that is shaded was taken by the United States Government without compensation. The court found that and fixed its value at 50 cents an acre.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to know where that language is in any finding of the court.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the gentleman will read the judgment, I think it is clear.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There is no dispute but what the land was taken from the Indians and that it was unpaid for. If the gentleman will examine the bill, he will see that the dispute comes in where the court allowed as a set-off a million or more dollars that was paid the Assiniboin Indians for their rights north of the river. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is a very able man, and I have a very high respect and regard for him and a deep affection.

Mr. COCHRAN. And I reciprocate it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want to say to the gentleman, the United States Government never paid any million dollars to the Assiniboin Indians or any other tribe of Indians unless it got value received and unless it figured that those Indians had a right there. What happened when it did that? It took the land. It took the land, and what did it do with it? It gave a portion to some of the Sioux. It gave another portion to the Blackfeet. It divided it up after it took it from these people. Then what else did it do? The Court of Claims in addition allowed as a set-off, if you please, what was received by the Assiniboin Indians for the surplus land that was sold. Where? In the Fort Peck Reservation and in the Fort Belknap Reservation north of the river. Why should the United States Government sell that land and give the money to the Indians if they did not own the land? That answers itself.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Do you want me to answer that?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. You can answer it in your own time.

Now, they have offset these claims, if you please—in the first place, to make it brief, the Government of the United States got value received when it gave this money; but in addition to that, now when we ask for pay for land south of the river, they want to offset, if you please, the money that was paid to the Indians for their rights north of the river. Now, that is what is wrong.

Mr. BURDICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. BURDICK. As a matter of fact, when this present case was in the court, the court allowed the Indians' claim for this specific tract of land?

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is right.

Mr. BURDICK. And then they offset the consideration for this tract of land by going over and taking the consideration for the other tract and putting it into this case.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Exactly; and that is what this bill is about.

Now, my distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] made the statement to the Speaker of the House:

> I object to the House considering this bill because it involves millions of dollars.

I will say the gentleman for once is in error. Approximately 50 cents or a dollar an acre for about 4,000,000 acres of land, with two offsets that are conceded, that is what is involved. One would be $600,000, an amount that the Assiniboin Indians had received as a gratuity or something for the land south of the river; and in addition to that $600,000 administrative expenses, and so forth, which would make in the neighborhood of $1,200,000. Now, if we follow the Court of Claims and value the land at 50 cents an acre, the probable recovery would only be about three million and some thousand dollars less $1,200,000. Now, that is all that could be recovered. That is the value of the land south of the river, less these offsets, in the neighborhood of $1,200,000.

Mr. PIERCE. Would the interest be accumulated?

Mr. O'CONNOR. No. My judgment is that the bill excludes interest, and I will tell you why. The Supreme Court held in what is known as the Klamath case that language such as this in a case of eminent domain, where the land was taken by the process of eminent domain, would include interest.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. O'CONNOR. In a moment. This, however, is not a case of eminent domain.

Mr. Chairman, my friend opposing this bill might say that it is wrong to include in the bill provision for an appeal to the Supreme Court. We took that language out of the bill to meet the criticism of the Attorney General: "And its review in the Supreme Court." The difference, I suppose, is that an appeal indicates a review of the merits whereas certiorari does not. You will remember that rule was inaugurated by the Supreme Court to enable it to dispose of a lot of cases at once, for it allows the Court to take jurisdiction or decline to take jurisdiction within their discretion. They assume jurisdiction in those cases only where there is great public interest involved.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. Under the terms of the first section the case would go to the Supreme Court if the defendant desired to take it after a decision in the Court of Claims.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The writ of review?

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; and the Supreme Court cannot refuse to hear it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Oh, yes. That writ will bring the case to the Supreme Court, but the writ of review has been interpreted to mean certiorari, which does not go into the merits of the case at all.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does the gentleman know any citizen of the United States who has that right?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that we are dealing with a white man's court. The history of this court, however, is one not to be proud of where Indian cases were involved. I realize, of course, that fantastic figures have been presented to the court for Indian claims, but out of 192 cases involving $2,500,000,000, only $30,000,000 has ever been recovered before this court—about one and a half percent, if you please. So far as I am concerned, I tried to place an Indian on that court so that the Indians would get justice; and I would like to see the Supreme Court compelled to take jurisdiction of these Indian cases in the light of the findings of the Court of Claims.

I now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER]. I believe he wanted me to yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I think my question has been answered.

Mr. O'CONNOR. All right. Now, let us start out with the bill. I think nearly every objection made by the Attorney General has been met. If the gentleman wants to modify the language of the review provision of the bill to read "review by certiorari" I shall not object.

The gentleman objected that we should strike out of the bill the language that there should be set off for credit or disbursement. I think that should have been in the bill, but to meet his objection we took it out.

Again, do you note the language with reference to the value of this property? In line 17, page 4, it is provided that a maximum value of the lands shall be $1.25 less the cost of survey and sale. It has been judicially determined not only by the Congress but also by commissions that 32 cents an acre is a reasonable charge to make that survey. This would bring the land value down to 93 cents an acre. While a maximum is provided there is no minimum. The court could find 25 cents an acre, if it wanted to, under this bill.

Mr. BURDICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. BURDICK. I just want to say that the power of the Court of Claims to hear, try, and determine one of these cases is limited entirely by the authority given to it by the Congress.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is right.

Mr. BURDICK. In this particular case, when the question came up and they raised the defense, citing this very consideration, the court said it did not have power which Congress granted it in the Authorization Act to go back of the facts and see what was paid. It did not have that authority. It is very difficult in these Indian cases to get justice done under the authority given, because if we lack one bit of authority, the court can only look through one glass at the facts, and if we have not provided a large enough glass, they send it back and say they have no authority.

Mr. O'CONNOR. That is right. I call attention to another fact. This bill does not directly cost the United States Government one cent. It simply gives these people their day in court and fixes that court's limitation. That is all this bill does.

I want to say another thing to the gentleman from Missouri. I know that his people have great faith in him; I know his voice will be ringing in this forum for years to come. The bill provides that every dollar recovered in this action will be deposited in the United States Treasury subject to appropriations in the future for the benefit of the Indians. Not one dime goes to those poor Indians. Their land was taken from them and yet, when recovery is had, the money is put into the United States Treasury subject to disposition and use by the Congress in the future. I know my friend from Missouri will be here.

I ask you gentlemen, the powerful men in this House, the leaders of the House, to take your heavy hands off the Congress and give these men their day in court. They have no place to appeal except to this forum. The Congress of the United States is the only place they can appeal to. They have no right to go to the President and they cannot go to the courts. They must appeal to the Congress. We are their forum. I do not need to call your attention again to the first ordinance that was passed by the Congress, in which the Congress pledged itself to give a square, honest deal to the Indians of this country and never take their land away from them without their consent and without just compensation. I ask you in the name of justice to give these men their day in court. If the Court of Claims had followed the instructions of Congress, this bill would not be here. But the Court of Claims must be taught that it has the Indians' rights to view, as well as the white men's rights to view, and, in my opinion, it has been ignoring the Indians' rights in the past. [Applause.]

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Montana is to be complimented for the manner in which he presented his case. Regardless as to whether we agree or not, no one can deny his sincerity, and his efforts to help his constituents are commendable. In conclusion, he appealed to you to give the Indians their day in court. Congress gave them their day in court in 1927 when it passed a jurisdictional act. The gentleman referred to statements in reference to amounts of claims heretofore filed as being fantastic. When the attorneys for the Assiniboin Indians filed their original petition with the Court of Claims the claims aggregated $62,000,000. That was the amount which the attorneys for the Indians asked. Is there anything fantastic about that? No; it was not a dream, but as the records will show, a fact. While the case was pending in the Court of Claims it developed, or at least the attorneys saw that they could not look for a favorable decision, so what happened? They came back to the Congress and in 1930 another jurisdictional act was passed expanding the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims in this case.

The court considered the case and denied the claim. An application for a new trial was denied. The Supreme Court was requested to review. A writ of certiorari was also denied by that Court. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, the Indians have had their day in court. By this bill the gentleman from Montana wants the Congress to give this tribe another day in court.

The Congress having passed two jurisdictional acts we are now asked to pass a third.

To my great surprise, we have a minority report on this bill, and I want to congratulate the members of the Indian Affairs Committee who are responsible for it. If you go back and look through the records you will see few minority reports have been filed by members of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Let the Members of the House read this minority report, an outstanding legal argument urging the defeat of this legislation. It cites its reasons in detail, and those who read it, I am sure, will join us in our efforts to defeat this bill.

There is provided in this bill provisions for a review on behalf of either party by the Supreme Court. No citizen of this country under present procedure is entitled to that. Are you going to give these Indians, who have already had their day in court, something which you deny to your constituents?

The gentleman from Montana states that this bill has been amended so as to practically meet the suggestions of the Attorney General. He did not state that the bill met the suggestions of the Attorney General. He said it practically met the suggestions of the Attorney General. But the Attorney General writes me that the bill would undoubtedly limit the United States in its right of set-offs, especially those that rose prior to March 2, 1927. Secondly, this bill specifically states that certain set-offs shall not receive consideration by the court, although in other cases these very set-offs, which this bill provides cannot be considered, have been credited to the Government. There is no sound reason why they should not be allowed in this instance if the pending bill becomes law. What does the provision mean that denies the Government to show set-offs prior to March 2, 1927? It means that although for about 60 years the Government has been making advances and gratuities to the Indians, the Attorney General will be denied the right to present them to the court as set-offs against this claim. Why not provide for an outright appropriation from the Treasury, as that provision will mean beyond question a favorable decision for the Indians. As to the amount, the gentleman from Montana says only a million or two, but no one knows what it will mean if the Government is denied the right to set off the claims of the Indians. The gentleman from Montana says as a lawyer he will say interest dating from around 1860 cannot be paid under the wording of the bill. He admits others take a different view, but when asked if he will accept an amendment specifically denying interest, he fails to reply in the affirmative. If, as he says, the wording of the bill does bar interest, then why not write in language that will make it certain? Interest from around 1860 will run into millions.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. COCHRAN. Just one second, and I will yield to the gentleman.

If we are going to go along year by year and continue to pass jurisdictional bills so worded that the United States Government will be divested of its right to submit proper evidence, there is no telling what is going to happen in regard to the amount that will be recovered. Why not let the Government submit its evidence in this case the same as you have in other cases? Why send the case back to the Court of Claims when we have already passed two jurisdictional bills and a decision has been rendered? I can see no reason why this bill should be passed.

The Department of the Interior, as everyone who is interested in Indians and Indian claims will have to admit, has been extremely liberal in making reports to the committee concerning jurisdictional bills, but in this case a letter was sent to the committee stating that this legislation will likely create a precedent which will be used by other tribes to reopen claims. The letter also stated the Director of the Budget had advised that the legislation was not in accord with the President's program.

I am going to read you the concluding paragraph of the minority report:

> The legislation proposed is dangerous. It will open the Treasury to innumerable future raids. It is an affront to recognized legal and equitable procedure. It will encourage people to continue to try cases over and over again until they themselves win decisions just as they want them. It avoids the equities of the situation because it imposes taxes upon the people of every congressional district to pay unwarranted, improper, and unearned appropriations. It avoids the procedure asked by the Department of Justice and the Attorney General and is inequitable and unjust in every particular. If these people are destitute, if they need supplies or relief, we ought to vote it to them; but we should not do this in the guise of a suit in the Court of Claims.

That is signed by the gentleman from Iowa, Hon. FRED C. GILCHRIST, the gentleman from Ohio, Hon. FREDERICK C. SMITH, and the gentleman from Michigan, Hon. FRED BRADLEY, three members of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Their report covers four pages besides what I have read.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. These gentlemen have given consideration to this proposed legislation, heard all the evidence, and strongly appeal for the defeat of the bill.

I say to the Members of the House, be careful. Do not open the door, because if you do, when the other bills come up you will hear the appeal, "You passed such a bill for the Assiniboins, why not pass it for this tribe?" The time has arrived when we should discontinue passing jurisdictional bills, especially when one such bill has already been passed.

I now yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I just wish to call the attention of the gentleman to this. I believe the gentleman will find the letter to which he referred, written by the Attorney General, was written to the gentleman before the amendments were made in the bill by the committee. We tried to meet every criticism of the Attorney General in the amendments to this bill.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman himself in his own remarks admitted that certain items would not be permitted as off-sets. Is not that true?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I said this. The bill excludes the set-off received by the Indians for their rights for land north of the river. That is all this excludes.

Mr. COCHRAN. It includes others, everything prior to March 2, 1927.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman from Montana knows that the Attorney General is still in opposition to this bill. Despite any statement that you have amended the bill so as to avoid any criticism the Attorney General made, the Attorney General is still against the bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know this, but the Attorney General is against all these bills.

Mr. COCHRAN. No; he is not.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have not seen him for any of these bills yet.

Mr. COCHRAN. The Attorney General may be for a bill if the bill is amended to meet his objections, but not when you take the Government's rights away.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; they want to amend the heart out of it, as the gentleman did this afternoon with the other bill. The gentleman wanted to take the heart out of it.

Mr. COCHRAN. I made a statement with reference to the other bill that was based on facts. I read from the President's veto message and wanted to eliminate the objections the President had.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman wanted to take the heart out of that bill, and he would like to take the heart out of this bill, and the Attorney General's office, through some understrapper, would like to take it out. Why should we permit the attorneys on the other side of the case to tell this Congress what we are going to do—how we are going to legislate? Because one department wants us to do it or the President of the United States wants us to do it? Have we reached that point? If we have, of what use is any Member of this Congress? What are we doing here? If the Attorney General is going to legislate or the President of the United States is going to legislate, or tell us what we can do or cannot do, we had better get out of here, because we no longer have any business here. Such yieldings of our powers and duties would simply mean a government by bureaus or by dictatorship, and I fear very much there is more to this thought than many of us would care to admit. I might add in this connection that it is mighty difficult, if not impossible, to get a bill out of a committee or through the House that has departmental or Executive opposition. Does a man who sits here in Washington in a swivel chair know the needs of the people better in the various congressional districts than the Representatives who were elected by the people?

Mr. COCHRAN. May I say this to the gentleman as long as he has brought that up: Who is legislating in this case?

Mr. O'CONNOR. We are trying to legislate so that the Indians will have justice.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is not the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; it is all of us—Members.

Mr. COCHRAN. It is the attorneys that have written this bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What if they did? The committee acted upon it and reported it out, 16 to 3.

Mr. COCHRAN. That is who is legislating here. They wrote this bill, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will admit, I may say to the gentleman, that they wrote the bill, but I stand back of it 100 percent, because it is just and honest; it gives to the Indians their day in court.

Mr. COCHRAN. Yes; they wrote the bill; not the gentleman from Montana. Now that is admitted.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The bill is properly written. If the Court of Claims had carried out the other instruction, this bill would not have been here.

Mr. COCHRAN. I may say to the gentleman from Montana that I would prefer to see the Attorney General of the United States prepare legislation rather than an attorney or attorneys who want to tie the hands of the Government and divest the Government of its right to file proper evidence when the case is called.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Have we reached the point that the Department of Justice is going to tell this Congress what to do? There is a difference between writing a form of a bill, presenting it for introduction, and a department giving us its views and expecting us to abide by those views. That seems to be the gentleman's position—that we should abide by the views of the Department of Justice.

Mr. COCHRAN. I hope we have not reached the point that we are going to let some outside attorney tell us what we are going to do.

That has been my contention for years—that attorneys write the jurisdictional bills—but this is the first time that I recall a Member has been honest and admitted it.

Attorneys who write jurisdictional bills so word them that they can win their cases if Congress passes them. Whenever you find a bill resubmitting a case to the Court of Claims you can just be sure provisions are made that will overcome some feature of the decision of the court in the previous case.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Sixteen members of this committee are asking you to pass this bill, while only three members on the other side are asking you not to pass it.

Mr. COCHRAN. So far as I am concerned, I am going to vote against this bill because I do not think we are justified in passing it, and I would vote against it if all members of the committee favored it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I asked the gentleman a few moments ago to lift his heavy hand off of this House because he controls it, so far as blocking Indian relief bills. I do not criticize the gentleman because of his power—for that he is to be admired. The power comes from long and sincere service. I am only appealing to him in behalf of an injured people.

Mr. COCHRAN. I thank the gentleman for his compliment, but I know I do not control this House. However, when the roll is called on this bill I hope I do control sufficient influence to defeat it.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, it is rather odd that we are here with just a small number present, less than 50, perhaps only 35 or 40, and only 15 or 20 listening to the discussion, and yet we are discussing a bill that involves nobody knows how much money, because the sky is the limit. We have a figure of somewhat over $6,000,000. Someone has said it might be $3,000,000 or it might be $2,000,000. The bill says over $6,000,000. I just now communicated with the Bureau of Indian Affairs downtown who says there is a possibility of interest being allowed of around 5 or 5½ percent from 1868. Now, if you have the time to figure out how much this bill amounts to, just go ahead and do it. If $6,000,000 draws interest at 5 percent it will amount to more than $20,000,000. Of course, if you are going to consider this measure seriously I shall offer an amendment not to allow any interest.

This is really a streamlined bill from top to bottom. It beats anything you ever saw. Here we are going way back to 1851 or 1868 and trying to recover or save some money for some Indians who were dead and gone years and years ago. Nobody seems to know who is going to get the money if and when it is paid. This bill provides not only that these matters shall come before the Court of Claims but tells you how the whole proceeding is to be conducted. It provides that if the Court of Claims finds certain facts it shall allow so much of a judgment, and it also provides that you are allowed to deduct only certain items, but certain other items you must not deduct. When the whole thing comes up the court must do thus and so. It can consider certain things but must not consider certain other items.

I really do not believe the gentleman from Montana wrote this bill. He may stand behind it 100 percent, and glory in his spunk. He has made a good fight.

I have no objection to attorneys' fees. I am a lawyer myself; but it looks on the face of the bill that if you allow 10 percent for attorneys' fees—and I do not know what other expenses would come out of it—there would be a considerable amount allowed for legal services. I do not know what legal services are to be performed by the attorneys in connection with this matter. That, of course, must be determined by the facts, but they must, of course, expect to perform a considerable amount of legal services to be allowed somewhere between $60,000 and $100,000.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I am not an attorney, but let us be fair and reasonable about this matter. The bill contains a committee amendment, which was offered by myself, as follows:

Provided, That the Court of Claims shall recognize its duty to protect the assets of the Indians of the Assiniboine Nation by scaling down all attorneys' fees and expenses involved to a point as far below the 10 percent maximum as the court may consider commensurate with the services rendered and costs incurred in this case.

This is a very drastic limitation on attorneys' fees, and I say that as one who is opposed to excessive attorneys' fees.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I think the gentleman has rendered a service to the country, if this bill is ever passed, by limiting the attorneys' fees to somewhere around, possibly, $1,000,000. I mean by that if there is $6,000,000 involved and you add interest to the extent of probably $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 more, you have around $16,000,000 and therefore you will have fees of about $1,600,000; but even at that, I think the gentleman has rendered a splendid service to the country in limiting the amount of fees.

There are only a few of us here, but I just do not believe you want to accept this bill. These people have had their day in court over and over again and it amounts simply to this, they did not get what they thought they ought to have in the court and they are asking the Congress to give them another chance. I think they have had their day in court and should be satisfied.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Have not these bills been passed heretofore and vetoed by the President several times?

Mr. REES of Kansas. I do not know that these particular bills have been passed and vetoed, but bills similar to them have been before Congress a number of times.

Mr. MAY. Similar bills; yes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I have all the sympathy in the world for the Indians, but the Indians who are entitled to any payments for these lands, if there ever were any, are dead and gone a long time ago, and if any funds are allowed the Indians who were entitled to it will not get it. I am in favor of protecting our Indians, and if they are in need, why, let us help them, appropriate whatever funds that may be fair and reasonable for their care and be liberal about it, but do not let us do it in this way. This is not the way to do it.

Mr. BROWN of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-one Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. Zebarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Eternal God, who dost measure out our lives in these hasting days, whose every dawning reveals what we have long since known, and in whose light we see again the faces of those we have long since loved: Teach us the secret of finding something new in the familiar relationships of life, that we may welcome each day as a fresh beginning, and fill it with the happiness born of the consciousness of work well done in Thy name and in the service of our beloved country.

Forbid that we should stand unchanged through any stubborn pride. Give us instead the nobler courage to confess our foolish ways. Grant that we may find even in the day's routine the possibility of doing old tasks with new-born joy, of working with old friends with ever-increasing gladness, that each adventure made under Thy direction may be a step in the stairway of the years leading up to that height where love refuses to be bound by time, where faith transcends each changing circumstance, and hope sees always a new dawn beyond the darkest night. In our Saviour's name we ask it. Amen.

The resolution is as follows:

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to make available funds for rural housing

Whereas the United States Housing Authority has inaugurated a program of rural housing which makes available to farmers of low incomes decent houses at an annual cost they can afford to pay; and

Whereas Lee County, Miss., has presented a feasible program to the U. S. H. A. for funds to construct 300 farm homes in the county at no cost to the county, and the Lee County proposal has been approved by the U. S. H. A.; and

Whereas 17 additional counties in Mississippi—Alcorn, Copiah, Forrest, Hinds, Kemper, Lamar, Lauderdale, Lee, Madison, Neshoba, Newton, Perry, Pontotoc, Prentiss, Scott, Tishomingo, and Union—have appointed county housing authorities; and

Whereas the Mississippi State Planning Commission is working with the county housing authorities in the preparation of applications from each of these 17 counties; and

Whereas many additional counties are contemplating creation of a county housing authority to make application to the U. S. H. A. for funds to construct good homes for the low-income farmers at a cost they can afford; and

GOLD-PURCHASE PROGRAM

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I present an editorial from the Philadelphia Record under date of February 15, 1940, entitled "Fool's Gold." It points out that America now has 65 percent of the world's total of gold, and that on February 8 that total passed the $18,000,000,000 mark, an increase of three and a quarter billion dollars in 1 year. I ask that the editorial be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of February 15, 1940]

FOOL'S GOLD

America's holdings of gold now amount to 65 percent of the world's total. The Treasury revealed Saturday that on February 8 our total passed the $18,000,000,000 mark—an increase of three and a quarter billion dollars in 1 year.

At the same rate of increase we will own all the gold in the world by the spring of 1943.

What will happen then? As the Record has frequently predicted, every other nation will probably repudiate gold as a monetary base, which would leave us with all the chips on the table and nobody to cash them. In other words, the gold placed in the Fort Knox hole in the ground wouldn't be any more valuable than so much hay.

The Scandinavian countries, during World War I, finally refused to accept gold in payment for goods. They recognized 'way back there that commodities are more valuable than any so-called monetary metal.

If we simply must accept gold from abroad, let's shoot it right back to other countries in exchange for rubber, tin, tungsten, manganese, other commodities we can't produce ourselves. And if we must bury something, let's bury the rubber, tin, tungsten, manganese, etc., against the day when we will need it and when gold won't buy anything.

INVASION OF POLAND

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the Thaddeus Kosciuszko Society, Group 358, Polish National Alliance, in its meeting held on January 15, 1940, at Milwaukee, Wis. I ask that the resolution may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions adopted by the Thaddeus Kosciuszko Society, Group 358, Polish Society Alliance, at its meeting held Friday, January 15, 1940

Whereas we members of the Thaddeus Kosciuszko Society, Group 358, Polish National Alliance, and Americans of Polish birth or extraction, are fully informed of the brutal invasion of the land of our forefathers by the satanic forces of Hitler Germany and Stalin Russia, such information having been given to us not only through the columns of the daily American and Polish press but also by direct cables and letters from our relatives and friends, citizens of the most unhappy country, now lying bleeding under the heels of those barbaric forces; and

Whereas such invasion of a peaceful, liberty-loving, cultured, and civilized nation was had without the slightest reason, without declaration of war, and the deliberate disregard for nonaggression pacts, for no other reason than to rob that people of their arch-Polish territory and to exterminate the Polish Nation; and

Whereas the barbaric purposes has been officially declared by those in control of the invading forces as follows: "We shall not stop in our work until the last vestige of former Poland has disappeared. We swear that we shall never change the course of our politics and that we shall fight in unified determination in the maintenance of German racial supremacy. This is no time for sentiment and pity, and we must persist in our position of steely indifference"; and

Whereas the cruelties committed by such brutal invaders upon the inoffensive Polish Nation, the weak and aged, women and children, noncombatants, and upon the soldiers bravely defending their Polish soil, and open land without natural defenses, have been of such diabolic nature as to beggar description; and

Whereas the executions of civilians and noncombatants and air bombings were systematically committed upon defenseless citizens, upon rural population, upon hospitals and orphanages, upon churches and synagogues; and

Whereas the population of Poland by such cruel invaders has been stripped of the last vestige of property, either real or personal, and is left without food, shelter, or sufficient clothing, without protection against the forces of invaders who continue their barbaric cruelties upon an innocent nation; and

Whereas the history of the world has never recorded such unbelieveable cruelty instituted, practiced, and threatened for many centuries past has never waged a war of aggression but has stood in defense of cultural rights and civilization and of the liberty of religion and speech; and

Whereas such a nation is entitled to the sympathies and material help from all cultured and civilized people of the globe: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, liverty-loving and loyal Americans of Polish birth or extraction, hereby appeal to our Government, to our fellow Americans, to take cognizance of the brutal injustice which has been perpetrated upon the people of Poland.

We therefore protest against this barbaric invasion and occupation of Poland by the forces of Hitler Germany and Stalin Russia, and we ask our fellow citizens to join us in our protest and join us in our work for relief and assistance to this most unhappy of nations, and we implore our fellow citizens and our Government to give expression of their horror at the barbarism, the physical and moral cruelties imposed upon and perpetrated against a civilized and cultured nation which for more than 200 years has been united in close friendship with the history of the American people; be it further

Resolved, That the original of these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, United States Senators, and to United States congessional Representatives of the State of Wisconsin.

REELECTION OF PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I present and ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD a communication addressed to me by William Conklin, Jr., enclosing copy of a paper in the nature of a petition being circulated in Teaneck, N. J., urging the American people to reelect President Roosevelt in 1940.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ROOSEVELT DEMOCRATIC CLUB OF TEANECK,
February 13, 1940.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR SMATHERS: Enclosed is a petition which we are circulating in Teaneck. It is our thought that a "draft Roosevelt movement" coming from the bottom up is the best way of expressing the true sentiment of the people. It is our great desire to see every New Jersey municipality join with Teaneck in sending a similar petition to the President. We have written to Mayor Hague asking him to take the lead in such a movement. If we could do this in New Jersey it could be done in every other State.

Very sincerely yours,
ROOSEVELT DEMOCRATIC CLUB OF TEANECK,
By WM. CONKLIN, Jr., President.

DRAFT PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND MAKE AMERICA SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY

To the American People:

This year we elect a President of the United States for a term of 4 years. But of far greater importance will be the decision of the voters on the issues of the campaign, for that will not only determine many serious questions that bear on the future welfare and happiness of the American people, but will also fix the course of our American democracy for many years to come.

The preamble of the United States Constitution sets forth the objects intended to be obtained through the institution of the United States Government. It says:

"We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

President Roosevelt has said, "I conceive the first duty of government is to protect the economic welfare of all the people, in all sections and in all groups." To prove that he has faithfully executed the Office of President of the United States, let facts be submitted to a candid public:

At the beginning of his first administration, on March 4, 1933, there existed an acute economic and financial crisis. By prompt action he saved the Nation from a serious financial disaster, and afterward set up the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation to insure the country against a repetition of such a crisis.

He provided aid for the stricken farmers through the A. A. A. and the Farm Credit Administration.

He gave help to the small-home owners through the H. O. L. C. and encouraged the construction of new and modern homes through the F. H. A. and the United States Housing Authority.

He promoted the general economic welfare of the Nation through the rehabilitation of the works at Muscle Shoals, the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the construction of similar projects at Grand Coulee, Bonneville, and Fort Peck.

He provided protection to the investing public through the S. E. C.

He has promoted general economic recovery through the reciprocal trade agreements.

He has provided economic security to millions of our citizens through the Social Security Act.

He has brought the conveniences of electricity to over 300,000 rural families through the R. E. A.

He provided a medium for the establishment of a better relationship between labor and management through the N. L. R. B.

He put an end to child labor through the Wages and Hours Act.

He provided emergency relief from the devastating effects of the depression through the C. C. C., C. W. A., and W. P. A.

He constructed many parks, playgrounds, hospitals, schools, and other public buildings; and he made many other public improvements all over the Nation through the instrumentality of the P. W. A.

These and many other acts and agencies of great public benefit were adopted and established under his vigorous and able leadership.

Under the neglect and incompetence of past national Republican administrations, the economic organization of the Nation was thrown into violent disruption, causing great suffering and hardships. The national income dropped to $40,000,000,000 in 1932. Since President Roosevelt was first inaugurated the national income has steadily increased year by year until it reached $64,000,000,000 in 1936, $70,000,000,000 in 1937, and an estimated $85,000,000,000 in 1939—the highest in the Nation's history. The 1940 annual report of the Chase National Bank of New York City, the largest bank in the world, says:

"The quickened business activity of the United States now manifested in trade and industry can be laid principally to domestic causes and only in limited degree to the war or to preparations for war. Business started to revive about the middle of 1938. Since then the volume of production has increased with interruptions until the present time, and the Federal Reserve index of manufacturing production now stands at the highest point yet reached."

For these reasons we sincerely and fully believe that the Nation's welfare demands that President Roosevelt be continued in office for another term. Furthermore, the Democratic Party must present a united front as a liberal party in order to win the confidence and support of the independent voters, and President Roosevelt is the only candidate who can command the respect and support of all factions within the Democratic Party. Therefore, in the spirit of that great leader of democracy, Andrew Jackson, we endorse for reelection President Franklin Delano Roosevelt, with these words: "Our American democracy! It must be preserved!"

THE UNEMPLOYMENT PROBLEM—RELIEF OF PEOPLE OF POLAND

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated at this point in the RECORD a resolution of the Board of Commissioners of the City of Trenton, N. J., memorializing Congress to lend its efforts to eliminate and reduce unemployment throughout the Nation; also a resolution by the United Polish Societies of Irvington and vicinity, New Jersey, petitioning aid for the population of Poland.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas conditions of unemployment throughout the Nation have been extant in such measure as to add fiscal burdens to municipalities and States in every section of the country; and

Whereas the problem of unemployment has assumed such proportions that its amelioration must necessarily be inaugurated as a national policy; and

Whereas technological advances in industry have created a grave problem in the distribution of workers of multifarious trades: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the board of commissioners do hereby memorialize the Congress of the United States to lend its efforts to eliminate and reduce to a minimum unemployment throughout the Nation; and be it further

Resolved, That the mayor be empowered, and he is hereby designated, to represent the city of Trenton at any hearings or conferences that may be held relative to the solution of unemployment; and be it further

Resolved, That any legitimate expenses incurred by the mayor in attending such conferences or hearings be defrayed by the city, upon the presentation of a duly itemized bill; and be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be submitted to the President of the United States, the New Jersey Members of the Senate, and the Member of the House of Representatives from this district, for the purpose of securing their active interest and support for the solution of the unemployment problem.

BERNARD J. WALSH.
LEO J. ROGERS.
EDWARD W. LEE.
JOHN A. HARTMAN.
GEO. W. PAGE.

Whereas the cataclysm of war and destruction has fallen with unspeakable horror upon the population of Poland; and

Whereas the inhuman brutality and intentional cruelty of powers of occupation intensify the suffering of hunger and want of said population; and

Whereas the general aid and succor to this population from the outside is prohibited or unnecessarily hindered by the powers of occupation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the United Polish Societies of Irvington and vicinity, at a meeting assembled, petition, and hereby do petition, His Excellency Franklin D. Roosevelt, the President of the United States, to use his good offices with the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Germany to open channels for outside relief of food, clothing, and medicine for the distressed population of all creeds and races in the occupied areas of Poland; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be also forwarded to His Excellency Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, and Senators and Representatives from New Jersey at Washington.

Chairman.
CHARLES MISHALSKI,
Secretary.

GUAM

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], chairman of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, has joined me in introducing a bill making effective certain provisions of the Treaty of Paris so far as the people of Guam are concerned. I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD a statement concerning the island and its people.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GUAM

The American people, generally speaking, know little of the island of Guam. Their picture is that of a barren island located somewhere in the Pacific. This is not, however, a true picture. The island is one of 17 which comprise the Mariana group. It is about 30 miles in length, and from 4 to 8½ miles in width. Its area is estimated at 225 square miles. Guam had been under the jurisdiction of Spain for nearly 300 years until it was captured by the Americans during the Spanish-American War. It was ceded to the United States under the terms of the Treaty of Paris, December 10, 1898, with a provision in article 9, paragraph 2, of the treaty, as follows:

"That the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by Congress."

At the end of the Spanish-American War, Germany purchased all of the islands of the Mariana group except Guam. These islands came under a Japanese mandate at the end of the World War. Among the other islands of the group are Saipan, 121 miles from Guam; Rota, 49 miles from the coast of Guam; and Tinian, 121 miles from Guam. So it will be noted that the island of Guam is in close proximity to Japanese-mandated territory.

The people of Guam are Chamorros descendants of the Malay race. The population is now mixed with the Malay strain predominating. English is the language of the younger generation. The old Chamorran language, as modified by Spanish influence, is still used by the older people. Since coming under the control of the United States we have built roads, provided for a system of sanitation, built electric light and power plants, provided an excellent school system, and have given the people a fairly full measure of liberty and freedom.

Guam was at one time fortified, and was not dismantled until after the adoption of the Washington Treaty of 1922.

The Government of the island is under the Navy Department. On December 23, 1898, the President of the United States signed an order placing the island under the control of the Navy Department. The instructions for the military commander, dated January 12, 1899, signed by President McKinley and Secretary of the Navy Long, reads in part:

"It will be the duty of the military commander to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends. All persons who, either by active aid or by honest submission, will cooperate with the Government of the United States, to give effect to these beneficent purposes, will receive the reward of its support and protection. Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the naval administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the island of Guam by assuring them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation substituting the mild way of justice and right for arbitrary rule."

The paramount aim of the naval administration was successfully accomplished. The confidence, respect, and affection of the people was won, and they have proved themselves American-minded. They have been loyal and law-abiding, and in all ways have cooperated with our Government. No group of American citizens under the American flag are more loyal to it than the people of Guam. Every day, when school is in session, 4,000 school children stand at attention in the plaza at Agana and renew their pledge of allegiance to the American flag.

Government by the Navy has been very successful. It is one part of the world where the budget is always balanced. The soil is very rich and produces copra, alligator pears, pineapple, sugarcane, citrus fruit, breadfruit, coffee, corn, rice, and potatoes in abundance. The population in July 1938, was 22,314, including about 20,000 natives. There are fewer than 100 foreign residents on the island, and 61 of these are Filipinos born under the American flag.

During the present Congress the bill (S. 830) provided for an appropriation which would have been very beneficial to the people of Guam. It was proposed in this bill, on the recommendation of the Hepburn Board, to make some harbor improvements in Apra Harbor on the island. The only improvements contemplated were the building of a breakwater and dredging to improve the seaplane take-off area, and if carried out would increase the area of relatively calm water for the take-off and landing of planes. The island is vitally important from the standpoint of naval as well as commercial aviation. It is of value as a possible naval station at which to base our Asiatic fleet when the United States withdraws from the Philippines in 1946. Its strategic position in the western Pacific makes it of inestimable value to the United States as a possible defense base which would act as a strong deterrent to any foreign power contemplating a hostile move toward the Hawaiian Islands or continental United States.

Immediately upon the consideration of the bill opposition was organized by the "peace at any price" group based on the assumptions that what is really intended is a fortification of the island, and they carried that opposition to a defeat of the proposal when the only improvements intended was the improvement of the harbor.

The people of Guam have been loyal to the United States for 40 years, and have cooperated willingly and helpfully for the development of the island. The people of the island are appreciative of all that America has done for them. Their spirit of cooperation is set forth in a resolution adopted by the Guam Congress, as follows:

"Be it resolved, That we renew our pledge of allegiance to the United States of America, to its institutions, to its ideals of justice and democracy, and that we affirm our happiness to be a part of that great Nation over which waves the Stars and Stripes."

These people have been upholding American ideals out in the Pacific and have never asked for appropriations, other than through the Navy Department, to support their government, and I submit that they are entitled to helpful consideration from the American Congress and the American people; and yet the Congress turned its back on the recommendations and the peace group claimed that a great victory had been won for the cause of peace when, in effect, the net result could well be appraised as a rebuff to a people who are the most loyal as those of any of our posesssions.

They are entitled to have United States citizenship conferred upon them, including the extension of naturalization laws. A bill to that end has been introduced, but do not expect that it will be acted upon at this session. It should receive consideration from the next session; and, in addition, it is my firm belief that Guam and our other dependencies should be represented in the Congress of the United States. As conditions now exist there is no one of authority to look out for the interests of the people who are so loyal to their home Government. We solemnly agreed in the Treaty of Paris that the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory ceded to the United States shall be determined by Congress. Now the people of Guam ask that the United States carry out its solemn pledge.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 38, submitted by Mr. WHEELER on the 6th instant) was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

COMPENSATION BENEFITS

Mr. McKELLAR. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report favorably, without amendment, House Joint Resolution 456, making available for the fiscal year 1940 an additional amount from the special funds heretofore set up for the payment of compensation benefits authorized by certain Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts, and I submit a report (No. 1206) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is quite unusual, and out of order. What is the reason for the urgency?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to state the reasons. I was just about to do that.

The House of Representatives has just passed this joint resolution, and sent it to the Senate. There are a large number of unemployment dues which have not been paid, and the Compensation Commission has asked very earnestly that an allotment be made for certain special employee-compensation funds heretofore carried in the emergency-relief measure. There are a number of them, and there is a balance available for the unemployment obligations as of February 1, 1940, of $14,607,242.

Mr. President, this joint resolution merely makes available an additional million and a half dollars from appropriations already made, for the payment of unemployment compensation benefits which have already been allowed, but have not been paid because of lack of money. The House undertook to take this matter out of the deficiency bill and put it in a special joint resolution, and they have sent it to the Senate. Mr. WOODRUM, of the House committee, notified us of the very great importance and urgency of the matter, and asked that it be taken up at once. Our committee felt that it should be taken up immediately, and the committee yesterday authorized that it be reported. Those are the reasons why I am asking unanimous consent that the Senate now consider the measure, providing for the payment of claims which have already been allowed and which are payable.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that is a fair and frank explanation. I do not like the practice——

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator entirely.

Mr. McNARY. Pardon me until I conclude. I fail yet to see any particular urgency about the situation. Perhaps we will have a call of the calendar today, or tomorrow, or on Monday; and would anything be lost if we should not take up the matter today?

Mr. McKELLAR. May I read from the House report?

Mr. McNARY. I shall object at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, earlier today I asked unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 456 be considered and acted on. At that time the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] stated that he would like to have the matter go over so that he might look into it. I ask him now whether I may not bring it up at this time and have the joint resolution passed, as it is very important that it be passed, and I understand that the Senate is to adjourn to Monday.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the statement of the able Senator from Tennessee is quite correct. I have looked into the situation and all the surrounding circumstances, and I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 456) making available for the fiscal year 1940 an additional amount from the special funds heretofore set up for the payment of compensation benefits authorized by certain Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have inserted in the RECORD the report of the committee on the joint resolution and also a statement.

There being no objection, the matters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Report No. 1206

The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 456) making available for the fiscal year 1940 an additional amount from the special funds heretofore set up for the payment of compensation benefits authorized by certain Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts, report the same without amendment and with a recommendation for its early consideration and passage.

Concerning this resolution, the Appropriations Committee of the House said:

"Under the provisions of prior relief appropriation acts, there has been set aside in a special fund from the relief appropriations, each year a sum estimated to be sufficient to pay all compensation claims for death and disability arising because of injuries received by persons engaged in emergency work and employed under that year's appropriation. In accordance with law, it is necessary, before this fund can be used, to have authorization in an appropriation bill for the amount thereof to be used in any fiscal year.

"The Independent Offices Appropriations Act for the fiscal year 1940 set aside $3,200,000 out of this special fund for the payment of claims of this character during the fiscal year 1940. This sum has proved to be insufficient and was exhausted by February 1 last and in addition thereto unpaid claims aggregate over $100,000. This joint resolution authorizes an additional $1,500,000 to be used from the special fund for the remainder of the fiscal year 1940. The next payments of death and disability claims are due on February 16, 1940, and other payments are due regularly again at the end of February. No funds are available to meet these payments. The Employees' Compensation Commission estimates the amount to be disbursed on February 16 at $500,000. There are 4,500 cases involved. These persons are in low-income groups and many of them without any other means of support, and as the first deficiency appropriation bill, which would normally carry this item, in all probability will not be a law until after March 1, the committee recommend the carrying of this item in a joint resolution. If this procedure is not followed there will be over a month's delay in the payment of these amounts due fortnightly to a large group of unfortunate persons."

Upon this state of facts and for these reasons, your committee report the above resolution favorably.

BRITISH INTERFERENCE WITH AMERICAN MAIL AT BERMUDA

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, when the so-called Neutrality Act was amended and a substitution made for it at the last session of Congress, an exception was made in the case of American aircraft landing at the British dependency of Bermuda. Since that time possibly no greater cause of international friction has arisen than the practice—the illegal practice, as our State Department has denominated it—of the British Government insisting on rifling United States mail landing at Bermuda. Very recently a United States clipper bearing an Ambassador of the United States, returning from his station abroad for consultation in Washington, was detained in Bermuda, and the mail on that clipper was rifled, and more than half of it was consficated. I therefore introduce a bill upon that subject, and, since it is very brief, I ask unanimous consent that it be reported for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The bill (S. 3360) to prohibit aircraft transporting United States mail from landing at Bermuda, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the Neutrality Act of 1939 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(m) Notwithstanding the exceptions contained in subsection (h), it shall be unlawful for any aircraft transporting United States mail to land, other than a forced landing, at the Island of Bermuda while a proclamation issued under the authority of section 1 (a) and naming the United Kingdom is in effect. The penalty provided for in subsection (b) shall apply to any violation of the provisions of this subsection."

SEC. 2. This act shall take effect on the day following the date of its enactment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator any suggestion as to the committee to which the bill should be referred?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think it should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

THE HUMAN NEEDS OF THE STEEL INDUSTRY

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, as you look at the seething inside of a Bessemer furnace you welcome the protection of dark-colored glasses. The fire is terrific. The molten metal does not simply boil; it leaps viciously against the sides of the furnace, like surf beating against a cliff. The temperature is around 2,900°. You do not find it comfortable to look at it for more than a few seconds at a time. Although you stand a considerable distance from the mouth of the furnace, the scorching heat is fierce beyond my power of words to describe. Your face feels blistered. The awfulness of the power in that golden maelstrom turns your body tense. You feel as though, if you did not hold onto the railing, you might fall, although there is no such actual danger.

These furnaces are built in the shape of an immense urn or vase, big at the bottom, curving to a smaller neck at the top. The only opening is at the top. They are three or four stories high and set on huge cradles so they can be tipped over and the molten metal poured out. The wrong pull on the lever would turn the whole vat over and dump tons and tons of molten metal all over the place. The men at the furnace are carefully trained, but there is constant danger. Formerly the danger was greater than at the present time. In the days of my mill experience I have known of a workman completely submerged in molten metal as though he were battling against the waves of the ocean. He was buried where he had fallen. Only men of courage, strong of body, alert of mind, and skilled of hand are fitted for this rugged enterprise. It is their life and they glory in it. These furnace men have to judge, merely by the color of the golden heat rising from the furnace, the amount of every chemical element in that boiling mass. In other words, they have to cook metal to an infinitesimally accurate mixture of a dozen elements, sampling it merely by their eyes upon a fiery glow.

My purpose in speaking today is to portray as accurately as possible the human side of the steel industry and the human needs that I see there. Unquestionably misunderstanding exists. The public has been led to believe that the steel companies are heartless corporations, harsh and selfish in their attitude toward labor, operated along monopolistic lines, feeding upon fat profits at the expense of the workers, who are pictured as being driven like slaves. This is an extreme point of view and does not make room for the many changes that have come in the steel industry with the passing years. Actually in no trade is competition more severe and no other industry has been so subjected to financial losses during these depression years.

The steel industry in the past has been reluctant to take the public into its confidence and tell the country the facts, especially in the field of relationships between management and employees. Consequently, there is prevalent today a curious and widespread assortment of misinformation and distorted facts concerning the steel industry.

Perhaps the attitude of the steel industry in the past was justified. It had gone about its own business quietly and efficiently, without feeling that it was called upon either to pat itself on the back or to defend itself. With the coming of the National Industrial Recovery Act, however, conditions changed. Corporations no longer did their business privately. Relationships between management and employees became matters of broad public interest. In the steel industry in particular employee-employer relationships were brought into the limelight. In justice to both labor and industry a review of these facts is now imperative. In my opinion, the steel industry, with but few exceptions, is not excelled, from the standpoint of the welfare of the workers, by any other large industry in the United States.

At least 2,500,000 men, women, and children look to the steel industry for their daily bread. In other words, the steel industry sustains directly the lives of as many people as live in Arizona, Delaware, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, and South Dakota combined. And this says nothing of the lives of millions of our citizens whose income is derived solely from servicing the needs of steel workers. The steel industry services the Nation; and the workers of farm, field, mine, mill, and factory service the steel industry. This is a reciprocal relationship that holds within its circling power the future destiny of the Nation. The steel industry is the industrial thermometer of America. When it is up, conditions are prosperous; when it is down, the adverse influence is felt in every crossroads town.

The total investment in the steel industry of this country is approximately $5,000,000,000. The stock represented by this investment is probably divided among at least a half million stockholders. The holdings naturally run from a few shares each to thousands of shares. Steel stocks are to be found in the safe-deposit boxes of hundreds of small-wage earners, professional men, school teachers, and others who have purchased stock in the steel companies with the belief that they were making a stable investment in a permanent, basic industry. These people have a right to expect a fair return on their investment.

Returns on capital investment in the steel industry throughout a period of years are illuminating. A recent analysis of net earnings on aggregate net worth of leading steel companies of the country in the comparatively prosperous period from 1921 to 1932, for a period of 12 years, shows them to have been 4.3 percent. In 1932 there was a loss of 4.3 percent. Rate of earnings naturally reflected broad variations in volume of production and indicated, on the whole, that profits in the steel industry materialize only when the industry is operating at 45 percent of capacity, or above, and that 80 percent of capacity, in past experience at least, has been necessary before earnings reach 6 percent.

In 1923 the 13-hour day gave way to the 8- and 10-hour day. I am glad to have been associated with President Harding when this important development took place. President Harding gave splendid leadership in this good cause. In the beginning there were some who said an 8-hour day would ruin the steel industry. But it was not long before a three 8-hour-shift program was found to have many advantages over the older 12-hour day. I can recall the 12-hour day from personal experience, and know how it seems to work in the darkness both at the beginning and end of the day. In 1933 the 10-hour day gave way completely to the 8-hour day and an average weekly maximum of 40 hours. At the same time the number of hours worked per week per employee was decreased to approximately 40 hours, average earnings per hour increased 22 percent. With the return of more normal operations at the present time the earnings of individual employees have increased.

Men who have risen from the factory and mill, in considering such matters as wages, hours, and working conditions, understand the worker's needs and judge sympathetically from practical experience and personal knowledge. The steel industry is now very largely in the leadership of men who have risen from the ranks. These men now have heavy responsibilities in finance, sales, and other executive branches of their companies, but their early associations bind them to the men with a deep friendship and sympathy. They want to keep in touch. They know, too, from their own knowledge that men in the mills like to deal directly with management. They believe that industrial relations should be on a man-to-man basis, with all the facts on the table.

In the old days, when plants were small and employees few, the problem of direct contact between management and workers was not as complex as today. My thought goes to my early mill experience in Sharon and Farrell, Pa. I think of Frank Buhl, whose name is honored throughout that valley because of the personal interest which he and his family took in the human needs of the steel workers. Every August a great celebration is held in that area to perpetuate the splendid spirit of cooperation which grew up out of the business vision and humanitarian purpose of Frank Buhl.

Today the size of an enterprise complicates the human relationships. Many steel companies require thousands of men to operate the plants. The census of 1879 showed that less than 141,000 wage earners were employed in the manufacture of iron and steel, whereas today the industry employs 500,000. In an earlier day the membership of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Tin and Steel Workers, to which I belong, included the greater percentage of workers in the industry. It was a strong organization, and one of which I am indeed proud. It came to the high point of its strength under a number of exceptionally able and public-spirited men.

During the last 50 years the trend of steel employment has been strongly upward. Although the substitution of mechanical equipment has released labor from some forms of toil it has not diminished the total number of jobs available. On the contrary the introduction of machines has created new fields of employment. There are two sides to this question. The machine has been both the glory and scandal of our age. It is the glory when it makes possible better workmanship, high-quality production, and lower prices. It is a scandal when machines are introduced with such rapidity as to deprive workers of their jobs, leaving thousands of them uncared for in the midstream of their lives. It is exceedingly difficult for a man trained solely to do the work of the steel mill, with his muscles, mind, and spirit developed for a single task, to transform his life and find a new line of work. This is a serious problem, especially serious for the man about 50 years of age. The problem must be faced resolutely and met in a practical way. The earnings of the machine must be geared to the human needs of all the workers lest the machine become a tyrant as unwelcome as the harsh rule of an oriental despot.

I am glad to say that a new cycle of industrial relations has been instituted with the passing years. Workers may associate themselves together into a group or trade-union for their mutual protection. Workers may select representatives of their own choosing to advance their mutual interests. Workers may enjoy these rights without interference from their employers. These rights are protected by law.

Obviously it is impossible for the chief executives to meet and talk to each one of the hundreds of thousands of wage earners in person. The problem has to be solved in the steel industry, as in many other industries, by employee representation plans adopted by employees themselves. These plans present a method of conserving the contact between workers and management.

Organized cooperation between unions and employers offers the best hope of meeting the obstacles to success which baffle society as a whole. Only when cooperation is complete can the full social advantage be taken of our wealth of natural resources, the skill of our labor, and the technological advances which have been the fruits of our brains. The employer willing to cooperate with labor brings out the negotiator whose greatest effectiveness comes over the conference table. A lot of good, hard brain work, and much education of labor and industry must be added to a willingness to use conference methods before the full measure of our national strength can be realized.

The wage earner desires continuous work at good wages, reasonable hours, fair and considerate treatment, a safe and healthful place to work, and a chance to rise on merit. The employer seeks increasing and profitable business, and insofar as possible he supports the workers' ambitions for increased purchasing power and a higher standard of living upon which progress in industry depends. There is no conflict between these objectives. There can be no class war over them. Employee representation plans are now in effect throughout a major part of the steel industry. Recently a survey was completed which shows that the employees of some 101 companies which employ more than 90 percent of the total number on steel-company pay rolls are participating in and actively supporting representation plans in effect there to the extent of 89 percent of all workers on pay rolls.

A study is now being conducted of the basing point system of the steel industry before the Temporary National Economic Committee. This relates to the old Pittsburgh-plus pricing system. I am grateful to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], chairman of this committee, who has so courteously provided me with much of the data which I have used in the preparation of my remarks on the basing point system. However, the points of view I express are my own and not necessarily his.

There was a time when all steel producers, regardless of their location, adhered very closely to the prices prevailing in Pittsburgh and also added the cost of transportation from Pittsburgh to the point of delivery. Thus, if a Chicago steel producer sold to a Chicago customer, he quoted the Pittsburgh price plus the cost of transportation from Pittsburgh to Chicago, although no such transportation was involved. Pittsburgh-plus was practiced in the steel industry as early as 1875, and thereafter was extended to many steel products. Not all iron and steel products, however, were sold on this basis. Steel rails and pig iron were not sold on the Pittsburgh-plus basis. In 1909 the United States Steel Corporation yielded to complaints against the sale on a Pittsburgh-plus basis of steel products manufactured in Birmingham, Ala., and agreed to sell Birmingham manufactured steel bars at the Birmingham base price, which was fixed at $3 per ton above the Pittsburgh price. The delivered price of bars from Birmingham was calculated, therefore, by adding to the Birmingham base price the actual freight from Birmingham.

In 1922 the Federal Trade Commission filed a complaint against the Pittsburgh-plus method. United States Steel then commenced selling bars, plates, and shapes on a Chicago basis, but Pittsburgh-plus continued to apply to sheets, tin plates, wire, and wire products. In 1924 the Commission ordered the industry to cease the Pittsburgh-plus system, and it was abandoned for sheets, wire, and pipe. Gradually, over the years, the independents established new basing points.

During the N. R. A. explicit provision was made in the code for the basing-point system, which had then become known as the multiple basing-point system. The code provided, with a few minor exceptions, an average of 4.6 basing points for each of 32 products, the range being from a minimum of 1 to a maximum of 11. In 1938 the industry established additional basing points, which are today represented by some 80 towns or cities. Of these, about 13 may be considered as major basing points.

The Federal Trade Commission has recommended the establishment of an f. o. b. mill price, which would require that each mill making steel be considered a basing point. However, the most comprehensive and widely accepted study of the steel industry now available, a two-volume work by Daugherty, De Chazeau, and Stratton on the Economics of the Iron and Steel Industry, does not support this point of view. I can do no better than present some of the findings of these scholars whose work was published in 1937.

Prof. Frank Fetter has long been an outstanding critic of the basing-point system. His point of view has been wholeheartedly adopted by the Federal Trade Commission. In his book, entitled "The Masquerade of Monopoly," Professor Fetter shows the discrimination inherent in a basing-point system of delivered prices, but his analysis of the evolution of this pricing system is couched entirely in terms of conspiracy and collusion. Nowhere in his book is there the faintest recognition that the economic conditions of production and distribution may have become fundamentally inconsistent with the existence of perfect competition. Professor Fetter never raises the question, What method of pricing can be made to work in the steel industry? His defense of the mill-base price rests not on an analysis of the steel industry, but on a deduction from the concept of a free market under perfect competition.

Mr. President, this is most unfortunate, for it brands as theoretical and visionary the findings of a scholar whose word has had its due measure of value. The conclusion of the Federal Trade Commission that an f. o. b.-mill system should be imposed on the industry because the basing-point system has somewhat restricted price competition is neither sound or logical. If we were to begin to advocate changes in existing conditions of our American life irrespective of what better provision may be made for them we should find ourselves in the position of the Federal Trade Commission as it now advocates the destruction of the multiple basing-point system.

The basic question is not whether free price competition actually exists in the steel industry. It is whether free price competition can be maintained or even imposed on the steel industry, and, if not, what method of pricing is socially and economically desirable. The opponents of the present prevailing system are basing their criticism on theoretical abstractions which are actually nonexistent. They exist only in the minds of the critics. They assume large proportions of astronomical value. Practically they are of little worth; and if they were actually to be imposed on the steel industry, they would produce such chaos and confusion as to retard business recovery, accentuate unemployment, and increase the already mounting burdens of grievance, of which labor today is carrying a full pack.

Price stabilization in the steel industry is impossible without either price fixing or a system of delivered prices. Since steel is a highly standardized commodity, produced and sold to exacting specifications, and generally ordered in large quantities for further production, even a relatively small price differential may be a deciding sales factor. The market for each group of mills and for each mill within the group is more national than local. That stabilization must be on a national rather than a local basis is the logic of the basing-point system. The breaking down of the prevailing system will be an open invitation to price cutting and destructive competition, which was a source of public menace many years ago when the steel industry was comparatively young. The burden of proof is on those who now call for an end of the basing-point system to show that a return to those conditions is now desirable. I am unwilling to accept this philosophy until something more constructive is presented than has heretofore been made available. I ask, How many thousands of workers will be put on relief as a penalty for such abrupt action? How many workers will lose their jobs? What provision will be made for their wives and children? How much will be added to taxes in relief and work-relief burdens? Who will be responsible for sound returns to investors in the steel industry? Who will wish to carry the task of promoting collective cooperation between management and employees under the instability of new and theoretical conditions? Who will find anything of practical value for any section of the country under the proposed change? What will the practical benefit be? Mr. President, I can see no benefit; and until one is clearly shown I shall continue to oppose this measure with all the logic and persuasion at my command.

Mr. President, I expect to continue to oppose the anti-basing-point bill. In my judgment the human considerations involved far outweigh the theoretical objections to the multiple basing-point system now in effect. The proposed legislation holds a threat against the jobs, savings, and general welfare of workers in the steel industry at the points where the industry is best established. It holds a threat which has no sufficient justification in terms of public welfare or prospect for improved conditions.

I know the life of steel workers. I know how happy they are in their work, how independent and free the average workers in the mills are, and how independent and free they insist they shall continue to be. I know the glory they feel in the work of their hands. I have seen them standing in front of the furnace, their fine supple bodies beaded with sweat, the perspiration glistening on their backs like dew in the morning sun. I know the character and the temperament of these men. I know that when you penetrate deep down in the heart of a mill worker you find the embodiment of the Scriptural injunction "Love they neighbor as thyself"; for these men live and work together in the true spirit of brotherhood.

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to say that the spirit of the steel men of America is the spirit of the youth of our land. The steel business is a challenge to the enthusiasm and independence of a young man. It is a symbol of the youth and strength of our glorious Nation. Let us understand the true spirit of our American youth and uphold it.

Recently a so-called youth conference assembled in Washington. The press carried front page stories of the demands which these young people were making on the Government. There was much question as to who these young people were and what they represented. I believe in American youth. I believe in American strength and courage. I believe in the independent spirit from first to last. Believing as I do, I am convinced that the great majority of the young men and women of this country do not wish to be represented as coming to the Government primarily to make demands upon it, but rather to present themselves for service to it. American youth has ability, brains, stamina, strength, and good heart. Our boys and our girls not only want to get something for themselves; they want to give their very best to humanity and to the Nation. In this spirit I propose that a genuine youth conference be assembled in Washington in behalf of the contribution to good citizenship which our young people are prepared to make. Let them come with colors flying, heads up, bodies erect, smiles on their faces, and proud of the land that gave them birth. Certainly American youth has lost neither its independence nor its sense of humor. As a man from the mills, speaking to the young men and women of the Nation, I wish to go on record that they still have the American spirit, which I have loved and cherished all my days, and that they still believe in their homes, their country, their God, and their Government. They believe, and they stand willing to back up their belief, with intelligent, forward-looking action and a definite program of American citizenship.

SALUTE TO THE BRAVE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in every part of the United States tributes are being paid to the brave and gallant people of Finland because of their heroic defense of the sacred soil of their country. There is unanimity in this Republic in the condemnation of the brutal and cowardly assaults which are being made upon Finland by Stalin and his Bolshevik forces. Indeed, in every democratic country, the view is entertained that Finland is fighting the cause of democracy against the forces of evil and autocracy. Many persons believe that civilization, as we understand the term, is being menaced by the Bolshevik regime, and that the danger to liberty and justice and civilization is perhaps greater than at many periods of world history.

If Hitler and Stalin should win, the democratic nations of Europe would be destroyed, and a system as cruel and reactionary as that which prevailed in the dark ages would be superimposed upon European nations, if not upon other peoples of the world. There are growing evidences of the solidarity of the Bolshevik and Nazi governments, and of the sinister purposes which unite them together, and of the hateful objectives which they seek to attain. It seems incredible that in this century, with the struggles, defeats, and victories of the past, with the advancement which has been made in many lands toward the summits of justice and moral and spiritual power, there should be those dangerous, dark, and ugly repercussions, which threaten democratic institutions, and civilization itself.

Bolshevism incarnates the most sinister and reactionary forces that have manifested themselves in ages of the past. Bolshevism is not only revolutionary; it is the destruction of the finest and best that can be found in life. It finds in Hitlerism and nazi-ism kindred spirits, and seeks association with them in order to achieve the objectives of both. Nazi-ism is not only a kindred spirit, but, to use common parlance, is a blood brother to Stalin and bolshevism; and so we find Hitler and Stalin—bolshevism and nazi-ism—linked together to destroy the finest and best in the world today, and to destroy democratic institutions and civilization in its highest form, and to subject the peoples of the world to the despotic rule of both.

Evidences are multiplying of the comradeship between Hitler and Stalin. If these evil forces prevail, not only will Finland be destroyed, but all democratic nations of Europe; and if Europe is brought under the rule of Stalinism and Hitlerism, then peoples in other lands, and governments in other parts of the world, may not escape. Austria has been destroyed; Czechoslovakia has been brought under the iron rule of Hitler; Latvia, Estonia, and Lithuania live under the shadow of the Soviet authority, and other nations in Europe are compelled to shape their external and internal policies to meet the threats and dangers which hang over them like a dark and ominous cloud. Not only is the peace of Europe disturbed, but throughout the world the specter of communism and nazi-ism is an ever-present source of grave apprehension.

Finland is fighting not only for the homes and lives of her people but for the cause of liberty and justice and civilization. She is carrying the banner which in many ages has been borne by brave and patriotic people who have been willing to sacrifice their lives in defense of justice and liberty and those ideals which have been the inspiration of the leaders of the world.

For a thousand years the Finnish people have occupied the land which we know as Finland. They are not Slavs, nor have they the characteristics nor qualities of the Slavic race. Though for a short period Finland was regarded as a part of Russia, it never was Russian in spirit, in culture, religion, and ideals. It is an independent democratic nation possessing those qualities which find expression among the greatest and most progressive peoples in the world. Its independence was recognized by Russia, and treaties entered into by Finland and Russia recognized the territorial integrity and political independence of Finland and the Finnish people. Stalin now orders the destruction of this brave and chivalrous people. He has marshalled hundreds of thousands of the Bolshevik forces against a pitifully small army defending the Finnish Republic. Stalin is not carrying on a civilized war. He is resorting to the most fiendish and horrible methods ever conceived by man to destroy men, women, children, hospitals, homes, churches, and to blot out and destroy an entire people. There have never been more barbarous or savage methods of destruction employed by man than those directed against the Finns by Stalin and his unnumbered hordes. Stalin with his 180,000,000 people may destroy homes, churches, hospitals, and butcher the Finnish people, but among all civilized peoples of the world there will be resentment and a fierce spirit of anger that will increase in intensity as the years pass by. In this and in future ages monuments will be erected to the Finnish people, and the genius of man will be employed in depicting their courage and patriotism. The Finnish spirit will never die. It will inspire men and women in future ages who are struggling for justice and freedom to fight on against all foes in order that peace and justice and righteousness may become the inheritance of all.

Mr. President, I have received during the past few days a number of letters from various parts of the United States in which the writers, speaking for themselves and in some instances for others, indicate a desire to aid Finland not only in a financial way but to associate themselves with its military forces. A letter which I received this morning gives the names of more than a score of persons—pilots, gunners, machinists—who express a desire to immediately depart for Finland to there take part in the contest which is being waged. The same letter states that other persons are ready to follow those whose names were submitted for the same purpose. The letters which I have received, as well as statements appearing in the press, indicate the deep resentment which the American people have against the Bolsheviks because of their assault upon Finland. They also indicated a desire upon the part of many to proceed immediately to Finland, there to join with the Finnish forces in the defense of that country.

The example of the Finnish people has aroused more than the imagination of the American people. It has awakened in their hearts a profound admiration for those who are struggling to maintain their homes and their liberty. Finland is being regarded as a symbol of the highest and noblest attributes of man, of those who love justice and liberty. The Finns are regarded by the American people, and by Christians throughout the world, as the defenders of not only their country but of Christian civilization.

I have just finished reading an editorial in this morning's New York Times, entitled, "Salute to the Brave," which, because of its beauty and eloquence, should be read by all Americans and all who believe in liberty and in the triumph of justice and righteousness.

The closing sentence in the editorial is so lofty that I close these brief remarks by quoting it:

> But of this we may be certain, after the experience of these weeks the struggle has not been in vain. In victory or defeat, in safety or disaster, Finland will remain a living symbol and a present influence on the affairs of men as long as liberty is cherished.

I shall not be satisfied by having the editorial appear at the close of my remarks. I send it to the desk and ask that it may be read by the clerk of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the editorial will be read.

The legislative clerk read the editorial, as follows:

SALUTE TO THE BRAVE

For 77 days the Finnish Army, fighting with its back to the wall, has staved off the inevitable. There has never been any reason to believe that a nation of a few million people could prevail against an adversary many times its size unless it had assistance from its friends. The very courage of the Finns has tended to conceal this fact. Nothing can conceal it any longer. An enemy that can use its overwhelming superiority in the air to cripple lines of communication; an enemy that can throw literally hundreds of thousands of shells against a short front in a single day; an enemy that can bring up wave on wave of fresh troops from an almost inexhaustible stock of manpower—such an enemy cannot be held back forever. It is typical of the Finns that even after losing the first outposts of the only line that stands between them and destruction, they fight as gallantly as ever. But the Russians have served notice now of the preemptive force of numbers.

For 77 days the Finnish people, as well as the Finnish armies, have given a performance that entitles them to receive promptly, and not merely at the convenience of others, such help as the outside world is prepared to give them, whether that help takes the form of loans for "nonmunitions," munitions themselves, volunteers, or contributions for relief. No people ever came through a bitter ordeal with a finer record. From the start they faced the fact that the longer their armies fought and the more damage they did to the prestige of the invader the more terrible would be their punishment in defeat. They have not let that prospect rob them of their courage. They have not lost their fire or their self-restraint. To the bravery of their own troops they have responded with quiet sacrifice. To the cheap taunts and the vicious slander of the Kremlin they have replied with dignity. To the outside world they have given an example of democracy as every democrat must hope to find it in the hour of its trial—resourceful, self-reliant, generous, determined. The example humbles those who are forced to wonder whether their own faith could meet this cruel test.

Whether outside aid will come in time to turn the tide that now runs toward catastrophe only the future can reveal. But of this we may be certain, after the experience of these weeks: The struggle has not been in vain. In victory or defeat, in safety or disaster, Finland will remain a living symbol and a present influence on the affairs of men as long as liberty is cherished.

CREDIT NEEDS OF INTERMEDIATE-SIZE BUSINESS

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, I desire to call to the attention of the Senate an article appearing in the current February issue of the Nation's Business on the subject of the credit needs of intermediate-size business entitled "The Plight of the Medium-Sized Business," and written by Mr. Roy A. Foulke. This is a most effective and convincing discussion of the credit needs of smaller enterprise in the United States.

The Nation's Business, official organ of the United States Chamber of Commerce, has not been in sympathy with many of the recently enacted social and economic measures designed to buoy up our national economic welfare. Therefore this article emphasizing the credit needs of intermediate-size business is all the more significant. It points clearly to the increasing realization on the part of all industrial and financial groups that some constructive and substantial proposal must be approved by Congress to meet the unsatisfied long-term credit requirements of small- and medium-size business.

I trust that this article will receive the attention of the Senate, and I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The article is as follows:

[From Nation's Business for February 1940]

THE PLIGHT OF THE MEDIUM-SIZE BUSINESS

(By Roy A. Foulke)

Probably no enterprise has ever made such an extensive variety of loans as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; loans to carry figs, prunes, butter, pecans, and cotton; loans to commercial banking institutions to forestall runs; loans to closed banks to bail out depositors; loans to build bridges and aqueducts; to railroads, insurance companies, building and loan associations, and public school authorities; loans where the funds have gone to meet pay rolls, to assist in refunding operations, and to build income-producing property.

These loans have ranged from $27.50—a disaster loan to a blacksmith in Tennessee at the time of a flood—to $208,500,000 to finance construction of a 240-mile-long aqueduct in Lower California. Over the 7-year period ending February 1, 1939, 7,371 loans totaling $447,324,578 were authorized to business enterprises. Of these authorizations 2,720, or 37 percent, were for $5,000 or less; 53 percent for $10,000 or less, and 83 percent for $50,000 or less.

From June 19, 1934, when Congress authorized the 12 Federal Reserve banks to extend credit for working capital purposes to established business enterprises, to December 29, 1938, the Federal Reserve banks approved 2,653 applications for loans involving $175,011,000. The smallest loan was $300 to a small eastern retail grocer to replenish his inventory, and the largest was $6,000,000 to an important middle-western industrial corporation. Approximately 23 percent of these loans were for $5,000 or less, 37 percent for $10,000 or less, and 77 percent for $50,000 or less.

Practically all of the commercial and industrial business enterprises that applied to these two lending agencies were financially extended and unable to obtain any or sufficient credit accommodations from their depository banks.

LOANS FOR SMALL BUSINESS

In the past year it has been the small business enterprises that have received the fatherly attention and consideration of our national legislators. I have seen at least 14 bills which have been introduced into Congress providing that credit be made available, whether needed or not, with or without a 90-percent guarantee against loss by an agency of the Federal Government. Paternalism has been creeping up.

What is this organism that is so widely termed a small business enterprise? Is it a corner drugstore with a net investment of $500, a wholesaler of candy with an invested capital of $10,000, or a manufacturer of shoes with a tangible net worth of $200,000, or all of them? The Securities and Exchange Commission has raised this question for investigation but, as far as I know, has come to no published conclusion.

In July 1939, there were 2,120,000 active commercial and industrial business enterprises in the United States; that is, concerns which manufactured, converted, assembled, imported, exported, wholesaled, and retailed merchandise, and concerns engaged in construction activity. That number does not include other types of concerns such as railroads, public utilities, banks or financial institutions, insurance companies, personal holding companies, professional men, or farmers.

Of these commercial and industrial business enterprises, 78.8 percent have a tangible net worth of $10,000 or less. According to a recent estimate, approximately 67½ percent of all concerns in this entire group are retailers. For a modest portion of these retailers, bank credit is available. Most of them are restricted to the use of credit from their merchandise suppliers, with some additional credit obtained here and there when a piece of machinery, a refrigerator, or a showcase is bought on the installment basis.

Economic activity in a capitalistic system is based upon the existence of this tremendous number of small-business enterprises. It is also based upon the existence of a steady flow of concerns in and out of the group, the liquidation of tens of thousands of these enterprises each year as they are unsuccessful, and upon a similar ease in starting new ventures. There is no other way, at this stage of our economic development, to obtain the refined distribution of all kinds of merchandise into every community, except by a gigantic development in the consumer-cooperative movement, and that would put hundreds of thousands of small retailers out of business even if it might otherwise be desirable. It should also be kept in mind that it costs little to open a small retail store and that a substantial proportion of such concerns are operated from homes so that they take only part of the owner's time.

So I would stress the fact that small-business enterprises are those which have a tangible net worth of $10,000 or less. They represent 78.8 percent of all active commercial and industrial concerns. It is hardly these business enterprises that are being considered when legislators, politicians, and economists talk about "small business." They are too small.

Now, on the other extreme, 2.5 percent of all commercial and industrial business enterprises have a tangible net worth of $500,000 or more. It is between these two groups—concerns that have a tangible net worth more than $10,000 but below $500,000—which represent the business enterprises that have really been receiving the attention of Washington. The concerns within this bracket represent 18.7 percent of the active commercial and industrial business enterprises of the country.

CREDIT FOR MEDIUM CONCERNS

Over recent years a feeling has grown up that enterprises in this middle group have not been able to obtain adequate financing. The statement is, of course, a broad one. To analyze it, we must remember that there are really three broad types of credit: Short-term credit, long-term—also called intermediate—credit, and permanent credit, otherwise known as capital financing.

A concern in this intermediate-size group—that is, with a tangible net worth between $10,000 and $500,000—in need of short-term credit would always go to its bank. If the concern was financially healthy, it would have no difficulty in obtaining the loan. If it was not, the banker would try to obtain some form of adequate security so that it would be good business for his bank to make the loan.

In the past 3 to 5 years, progressive bankers have gone out of their way to find methods and techniques for making such loans safely and securely. If, however, no adequate basis could be arrived at, the concern could then go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or to one of the Federal Reserve banks as these institutions do not need or require the same degree of liquidity as local commercial banking institutions, and they have been and are able to extend loans to marginal risks.

The second type of credit is long-term credit. Here we have a different story. During the past 5 years, the larger commercial banks have shown a tendency to make what has come to be known as term loans, a banking policy previously considered unsound.

Term loans are a form of long-term credit. They run mostly from 3 to 5 years, although occasionally such a loan is granted for 10 years, generally reduced by annual or semiannual installments. Such loans have been made primarily by the larger commercial banks to outstanding, successful, nationally known corporations at low interest rates to retire funded obligations carrying higher rates, for plant expansion, and for working capital.

Concerns in the intermediate-size group have been able to obtain long-term funds in the form of mortgage money if they owned real estate and fixed assets acceptable to insurance companies, building and loan companies, or local savings banks. The market for mortgage money is freer than ever in our history. Few intermediate-size concerns have obtained "term loans" from their depository banks.

Loans for working capital purposes can, moreover, be made by Federal Reserve banks with the maturity up to 5 years and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made loans to business enterprises up to 20 years.

We are finally left with two problems, as far as financing is concerned, but they blend together. These two problems visualize:

1. The need for an organized market to provide intermediate financing, not short-term financing for 3 to 6 months for seasonal operations, but long-term financing for 2 to 20 years.

2. Permanent equity financing to develop profitable growing corporations in expanding industries.

These are the definite, positive needs to assist in solving many of our economic ills and they are needed, not for small business or big business, but for the enterprises sandwiched between these two groups and with tangible net worths between $10,000 and $500,000.

THE PROBLEM OF FINANCING

When we come to the problems of raising long-term money and permanent capital by issuing securities, we arrive at the crux of our economic dilemma, at the actual needs of business enterprises which, in turn, is the crucial point in our entire commercial and industrial system. The financing of successful intermediate-size corporations has largely dried up.

There are 8,000,000 unemployed in the United States. There are only two ways to get jobs for them—either the Government must give them jobs or private industry must do so.

For private industry to provide jobs the flow of investment money into business must be increased.

The larger, well-known national corporations that have profits ranging upward from $200,000 a year have an organized market in normal times for raising funds by selling securities. The intermediate-size corporations, however, have no organized money market and have never had one.

Concerns that have a tangible net worth between $10,000 and $500,000 have obtained funds in the past largely from wealthy individuals and from affiliated concerns.

There is every indication, however, that wealthy individuals have been investing a steadily decreasing proportion of their funds in business enterprises of this character with the income-tax rates where they stand today in the higher brackets, and with the opportunity of investing in tax-exempt securities.

I have just said that there has never been an organized financing market to raise funds for concerns in this group. This is absolutely so, but there has always existed the chance that there would be some local public distribution of securities by concerns of this size. Where that has taken place, from time to time, the cost of raising funds has been high, and often after the security issue has been offered to the public it has been only partially sold.

A recent study shows the cost of raising money in 1937 by 118 industrial corporations for which comparable data was available to the Securities and Exchange Commission.

In this tabulation, mining corporations were omitted, as the cost of raising capital has been much heavier for these enterprises than for typical industrial corporations. Retail corporations have also been omitted as information on only 19 corporations in this category was available and, when that number was broken down into size categories, there were too few to give reliable information. No similar studies have been made covering 1938 or 1939 security registrations.

WHERE FINANCING IS EXPENSIVE

It is evident from this study that intermediate-size corporations selling bond issues of less than $250,000 had to pay $9.10 on the average for each $100 bond sold; $18.10 for each $100 of preferred stock and $18.10 for each $100 common stock.

In contrast, we find that large corporations—not the biggest—which sold issues ranging in size from $1,000,000 to $5,000,000 paid $5.60 for each $100 of preferred stock and $14 for each $100 of common stock.

Where less than $1,000,000 was raised by an issue of securities, the costs were materially higher than where more than $1,000,000 was raised. Even in those few instances where intermediate-size corporations have raised long-term money or permanent capital from the public, the costs have been heavy.

Moreover, a study released by the Research and Statistics Section of the Trading and Exchange Division of the Securities and Exchange Commisison last June indicated the extreme difficulty of smaller unseasoned issuers in marketing securities even with these heavier costs.

The study covered 584 issuers of this type that had registered $321,000,000 of securities between July 7, 1933, and June 30, 1937. The conclusions were:

1. These issuers succeeded in selling only 23 percent of the securities registered within a year from the date the registration became effective.

2. About one-third of these 584 issuers did not attempt to or did not succeed in selling any part of the securities registered. The remaining 393 issuers reported sales equivalent to only 34 percent of the amount registered.

3. Going concerns were considerably more successful in selling their securities than were new ventures. Of the 393 issuers reporting any sales at all, the going concerns sold 44 percent of the amount registered while the new ventures sold only 27 percent.

4. Success or failure of these smaller issues was evidently determined within a relatively short period after registration. About 71 percent of the reported sales were made within 3 months after registration.

So, under the existing set-up of our economic structure, we find no organized facilities to provide long-term money or permanent capital to intermediate-size concerns.

Here is our outstanding fundamental American problem, our economic vacuum, and it is growing bigger and more important day by day.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, the Chicago Daily Times is one of the influential newspapers published in the Midwest. I am informed that it has a circulation of approximately 400,000 rural and city readers.

On February 8 last there appeared in that daily newspaper an editorial entitled "They Can't All Be Wrong." The editorial deals rather realistically with one of the fundamental economic problems now before the Congress of the United States.

I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to read some of the telling and trenchant points made in this plain and understandable editorial dealing with reciprocal-trade agreements:

THEY CAN'T ALL BE WRONG

During the economic upheavals of the past 10 years, American economists, considered as a collective whole, have spent most of their time mounting a horse and riding off in all directions. On abandonment of the gold standard, the silver-purchase policy, Government deficits, social security, wage-hour laws, agricultural aids, taxation theories, securities-market regulations, and a dozen other subjects, they have disagreed with each other loudly and emphatically.

This does not necessarily indicate that economists, or a large part of them, are always wrong. All the golf pros in the Nation have violent disagreements as to the best golf form. But there are certain fundamentals, such as keeping the eye on the ball, holding the head down and steady, keeping the left arm straight, and following through, upon which all the pros agree.

So there are certain fundamentals upon which economists are so nearly unanimous that it is sheer folly to disagree with them. For example, 10 years ago practically every economist in the Nation warned that the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act would be disastrous. And see what happened to our foreign trade in the years following passage of that monstrosity.

Last week W. W. Waymack, Des Moines editor of a stanchly conservative, Republican newspaper, and chairman of the National Economic Policy Committee, released the results of a poll taken among 530 leading American economists on the subject of Cordell Hull's reciprocal-trade treaties. The vote was 520 to 10—in favor of the Hull policy.

Digressing from the editorial for just a moment upon that poll, I say it is a remarkable thing to find 520 out of 530 economists in this Nation agreeing that the reciprocal-trade agreements should be continued at this session of Congress. I have had some experience with economists. I have witnessed them as they appeared before committees and in other activities throughout the Nation; and to find a majority such as the senior Senator from Illinois has presented to the Senate through the editorial agreeing upon any given fundamental proposition is, in my humble opinion, a marvelous tribute to the principles of the Hull trade agreements.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Is it not also true that in addition to the economists, the great body of the people of the Senator's State and of all our States agree with the principles of the Hull agreements?

Mr. LUCAS. I do not think there is any question about that, once the people of the country thoroughly understand and appreciate what the treaties are. That is one of the reasons why I am submitting this editorial here today, for the sole purpose of disseminating some information through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in order that the people may have a better understanding of what the economists of the country—who are at least presumed to know something about the fundamentals of a problem of this kind—are thinking about at this moment. What I hope is that independent, sincere, thinking citizens everywhere will give studious and thoughtful consideration to the vast policy of economics involved in these agreements. They affect us all.

The editorial continues:

Seldom has any governmental policy about which the facts are plain and indisputable been subjected to as much bald misrepresentation and misinterpretation as has the reciprocal-trade program. * * *

IT'S JUST A MATTER OF SIMPLE ARITHMETIC

The overwhelming endorsement given the trade treaties by the Nation's economists is easy to understand. The primary basis for the economists' approval is just elementary arithmetic. It is simply that you can't subtract something from nothing. If we try constantly to sell more abroad than we buy, it is only a question of time until we're trying to take something from nothing. That is, foreign nations don't have anything with which to pay us for our goods unless we pay them something by buying from them.

The second fact which the economists recognize is that since 1935 our exports to countries with whom we have reciprocal treaties have increased 60 percent, while to those countries with whom no such treaties exist, the increase in exports has been only 39 percent.

And finally the economists have seen that despite the reciprocal-trade treaties, in the past couple of years our excess of exports over imports has increased to new record highs. They know that unless that condition is arrested it cannot be long until our exports shrink up and disappear.

One does not need to be an economist to recognize these simple truths. Any sensible person can understand facts as elementary as these. And any citizen who does not have some selfish reason for desiring a monopolistic bar against imports can realize the utter folly of abandoning the policy laid down by Mr. Hull at this time.

OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE—NOTICE OF SPEECH

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, last week I gave notice that on last Monday I should discuss Senate Joint Resolution 145, introduced by myself and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] last June, and now on the Senate Calendar with a favorable report from the Senate Judiciary Committee.

The Senate did not convene last Monday, so I now give notice that on next Monday, prior to the calling of the calendar, I shall discuss the provisions of Senate Joint Resolution 145, relating to old-age assistance, as it may affect not only the economic life of the old people and our youth, but the social and economic life of all our citizens.

Several Senators have asked that I give this notice, and have expressed a desire to be present at the time of this discussion.

AMERICAN YOUTH

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, in these trying times there is a dangerous growth of a "defeatist" philosophy in America. The growth of this philosophy parallels a growing dependence of the people on government.

Today my attention was directed to a very gratifying article indicating that the youth of America do not subscribe to this school of thought.

A special poll on the state of mind of a national cross section of high-school students who learned to read during the depression years has just been concluded by a professional publication sent to high-school teachers all over America. The results of this poll demonstrate the rising tide of a spirit of youthful American individualism. The poll reaffirms the faith of American youth in the future of democracy as opposed to governmental regimentation. In this poll the boys and girls of America restate their American heritage of initiative in their expression of preference for a job in private industry over a Government job. From every State in the Union came the ballots in this poll of youth asserting the independence of American boys and girls between the ages of 16 and 17.

In a day when elsewhere the youth of other lands are being prodded into the dreary lock step of war drills, it is a genuine thrill to know that in America our boys and girls have not given in to defeatism. Probably the finest heritage our youth can have is the unconquerable spirit of independence, of courage, and of confidence.

It is encouraging to know that the drab depression years have not taken the starch out of the next generation. This next generation is not a generation given to blind unreasoning idealism. It is a generation which has had its "ears pinned back" during the bitter rock-bottom years when its members learned to read—learned to read the sordid story of the vanishing paper profits of a bull market. But this generation has refused to become discouraged, knowing that America still possesses the great enduring values.

These are the sons and daughters of the "lost war generation." That their composite picture is one of courage and high expectations stems from the fact that they have confidence in themselves and in the future of the country.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a thought-provoking article entitled "American Youth Is Still Full of Fight" inserted in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

AMERICAN YOUTH IS STILL FULL OF FIGHT—SCHOLASTIC POLL OF HIGH-SCHOOL STUDENTS' VIEWS ON PROBLEMS OF YOUTH AND OPPORTUNITY SHOWS STRONG FAITH IN AMERICA'S FUTURE

There is always someone ready to view with alarm the actions and opinions of the younger generation. The subject continues a favorite topic of conversation or gossip among the elders in spite of the fact that young people usually beat their elders to the gun with a "tsk, tsk, these deplorable youngsters!" Scholastic's frequent student opinion polls continue to prove that the high-school students of today have all the admirable characteristics symbolic of youth in every age: independence, courage, and confidence. And today's high-school students continue to typify the American spirit of individualism, faith in the future of our country, and determination to better themselves.

Many people wonder what the depression has done to today's high-school students. Has it destroyed the admirable attributes of youth? Has it taken the starch out of the younger generation? Scholastic received a resounding "No!" to these questions when it polled the state of mind of a cross section of high-school students and analyzed the answers to 7 questions on ballots filled out by 6,082 boys and girls. One thousand of the students we polled as groups; the other 5,000 filled out individual ballots. Ballots were obtained from every State and every type of community.

The Your State of Mind poll as published in Scholastic is reproduced below with the percentages showing how today's high-school students answered the questions. (The answers of boys to all questions were practically the same as the answers of girls. Also, the replies of students living in cities of over 100,000 population differed little from those responses coming from towns of less than 100,000 population.) In the same issue with the poll, we published an article by Dorothy Thompson entitled "Youth and Opportunity" in which she took young people to task for some of their attitudes, including their apparent unwillingness to take any job at hand. In the face of this very criticism, the high-school students admitted the truth of Miss Thompson's accusation; 62 percent said they were determined to hold out for jobs that include a living wage, a chance for advancement, or an opportunity to exercise their special talents.

AMERICAN YOUTH INDEPENDENT

But these same young people, by their answers to other questions, sharply challenged Miss Thompson's interpretation of their attitudes. Only 10 percent of them expressed the belief that Government jobs should be provided for young people until times improve, and 61 percent said that if they had trouble finding jobs they would blame themselves.

Furthermore, young people are quite aware of their independence. Only 16 percent of them believe that young people adopt and stick to their parents' opinions in political, social, and economic matters—and the remaining 84 percent say they intend to make up their own minds about these problems.

Only 44 percent said "Yes" when they were asked whether—because of present conditions—it is more difficult to get ahead today than at any other time. This percentage contrasts sharply with the 80 percent who gave an affirmative answer to the same question in the Y. M. C. A. poll of young people in New York City. The group responding to the Scholastic poll evidently believe that their chances for the future are good—so good that the Government need not provide for them—so good that the direction of their lives and the solution of their problems lie largely with themselves.

They have their own answer for the unemployment problem: 90 percent of them believe that the best cure for unemployed youth and for young people in dead-end jobs is further preparation. Of this 90 percent, 31 percent voted for more school and college, and 59 percent recommended expert vocational counsel.

The response to question 5, regarding where students will place the blame if they have difficulty in finding a job, was an enlightening revelation of their thinking. Sixty-one percent will be inclined to blame themselves on the grounds that they have not taken advantage of the training opportunities offered them. Only 1 percent will blame their parents for not guiding them toward the proper field. Only 6 percent will blame their education for not teaching them the necessary skills. And, in spite of the constant talk of their elders, only 32 percent will blame an economic situation that has less than enough jobs to go around. Answers to this question show plainly that these young people are no generation of bellyachers. These young people have very little inclination to "let themselves off" in the final analysis.

FAITH IN AMERICA'S FUTURE

Some people will dismiss the convictions of high-school students as the blind idealistic thinking of people who "haven't had their ears pinned back" and who will change their minds soon enough when they come to grips with the outside world. Others will say the opinions are the result of little knowledge about present conditions.

It's quite true that these young people give Miss Thompson further proof that they are not in the market for just any job. Only 10 percent of them will take a dead-end job, and only 25 percent will take a routine job with a chance to learn skills. The remaining 62 percent ask much of the job they seek for themselves in the future: 44 percent say that it must give them a chance for advancement and a living wage, and 18 percent say that they will take only a job in which they can exercise their special talents.

But we're inclined to think that these high expectations stem from the fact that American young people have confidence in themselves, place real value on their talents, and have faith in the future of their country. We also see, in this attitude of young people, an affirmation of the traditions of American independence and democracy. The right to a choice. A refusal to be regimented. In effect, an encouraging example of the privileges of democracy which Miss Thompson champions so effectively.

Nor can we believe that these young people are ignorant of the Nation's problems. They are between 16 and 17 years of age. Having learned to read during the depression, they could not escape the constant publicity given to our Nation's problems in the press, the newsreels, over the radio, and in the schoolrooms. Then, too, many of them have faced hardships as children of the unemployed.

The church will look with concern upon the 85 percent who feel that they are guided less by religion than their parents were. The normal impression would be that the large cities are less religious than the more rural areas; but, according to our poll, exactly the opposite is true. Eighty-five percent of students in towns under 100,000 said that they were less guided than their parents by religion; in cities over 100,000 the percentage dropped to 82 percent.

But, generally speaking, the composite portrait of American youth which this poll paints for us is a pleasant one. Courage, high expectations, determination, and a willingness to take responsibility are the keynotes of high-school thinking. And, if the students who show these qualities are due for some disappointments in the future, we believe this very poll proves they will be able to take the blows, and bounce back, because they've plenty of gumption.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE TREASURY AND POST OFFICE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8068, which is the appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8068), making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I—Treasury Department—United States Processing Tax Board of Review," on page 20, line 21, after the numerals "1936", to insert "as amended,"; so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For salaries and expenses of the Board of Review established by section 906 of the Revenue Act of 1936 for review of the disallowance by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of claims for refund of processing taxes filed under title VII, Revenue Act of 1936, as amended, including personal services and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, stationery and office supplies, equipment, furniture, mechanical devices, law books and books of reference, press releases, trade journals, periodicals, and newspapers, contract reporting services, telegraph and telephone services, postage, freight, express, printing and binding, notarial fees, travel expenses, and such other miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized or approved by the Secretary of the Treasury for the work of this Board, $145,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Coast Guard," on page 26, line 18, after the word "signals" and the semicolon, to strike out "not to exceed $100,000 for the acquisition of a site and commencement of construction of the station authorized by the act approved June 29, 1936 (49 Stat. 2031);"; on page 29, line 16, after the word "heading", to strike out "$11,260,000" and insert "$11,160,000", and in line 17, after the word "item", to strike out "$10,225,000" and insert "$10,125,000"; so as to read:

General expenses, Coast Guard: For fuel, lubricating oil, illuminants, kerosene, and water; the furnishing of heat, light, and power (service) for vessels, shore stations, depots and offices; outfits, including necessary supplies and equipment, medals, newspapers, technical books and periodicals, and library books for shore stations and vessels; rental of mechanical accounting machinery and other equipment; repairs to portable equipment at shore units; ship chandlery, engineers' stores, draft animals and their maintenance; purchase (not to exceed $5,000), exchange, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use at headquarters and in the field; the rebuilding, repairing, maintenance, and incidental expenses of shore stations, including lighthouses, lights, beacons, and other fixed aids to navigation, radio stations, depots and offices; temporary leases and rentals; improvement of property for Coast Guard purposes, including rental or use of additional land where necessary and the purchase of land for beacons, day marks, and fog signals; repairs to Coast Guard vessels, boats, and aircraft, including cost of salvage operations when incident to the repair thereof; repair, maintenance, and operation of vessels forfeited to the United States and delivered to the Treasury Department under the terms of the act approved March 3, 1925 (27 U. S. C. 41); coastal communication lines and facilities and their maintenance, and communication service; establishment, maintenance, repair, and improvement of post lights, buoys, submarine signals, fog signals, beacons, day marks, and other aids to navigation; construction of necessary outbuildings, including oil houses at light stations, at a cost not exceeding $2,500 at any one light station in any fiscal year; wages of persons attending post lights; temporary employees and field force while engaged on works of general repair and maintenance, and laborers and mechanics at lighthouse depots; rations and provisions, or commutation thereof, for working parties in the field, officers and crews of light vessels and tenders, and officials and other authorized persons of the Coast Guard on duty on board of such tenders or vessels, but money accruing from commutation of rations and provisions for the above-named persons on board tenders and light vessels or in working parties in the field may be paid on proper voucher to the person having charge of the mess of such vessel or party; not exceeding $3,500 for packing, crating, and transporting personal household effects of employees, not to exceed 6,000 pounds in any one case, when transferred from one official station to another for permanent duty; purchase of rubber boots, oilskins, rubber gloves, goggles, and coats, caps, and aprons for steward's department on vessels; fuel, light, and rent of quarters where necessary for keepers of lighthouses; traveling expenses of teachers while actually employed by States or private persons to instruct the children of keepers of lighthouses; not to exceed $1,500 for traveling expenses of new appointees from ports of embarkation in the United States to first post of duty at isolated light stations in districts outside the continental limits of the United States, and not to exceed $2,500 for the transportation of the children of lighthouse keepers at isolated light stations where necessary to enable such children to attend school, as authorized by the act of May 13, 1938 (52 Stat. 353); necessary traveling expenses of lighthouse keepers at isolated stations incurred in obtaining medical attention as authorized by the act of February 25, 1929 (45 Stat. 1261); purchase of provisions for sale to Coast Guard personnel at isolated stations, and the appropriation reimbursed; contingent expenses, including subsistence and clothing for shipwrecked and destitute persons succored by the Coast Guard, and including reimbursement, under rules prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of Coast Guard personnel who furnish from their personal stock subsistence and clothing to such persons; subsistence of prisoners while in the custody of the Coast Guard; instruments, apparatus, and services necessary to the carrying on of scientific investigation, and not to exceed $4,000 for experimental and research work; motion-picture equipment (not to exceed $30,000) and material for official purposes; care, transportation, and burial of deceased officers and enlisted men, including those who die in Government hospitals; apprehension of deserters; wharfage, towage, freight, storage, advertising, surveys, entrance fees in matches for the rifle team and special equipment therefor; not to exceed $2,500 for contingencies for the Superintendent, United States Coast Guard Academy, to be expended in his discretion; payment of rewards for the apprehension and conviction, or for information helpful to the apprehension and conviction, of persons found interfering, in violation of section 6 of the act of May 14, 1908 (33 U. S. C. 761), with aids to navigation maintained by the Coast Guard; and all other necessary expenses which are not included under any other heading, $11,160,000 (composed of "A" item, $10,125,000, and "B" item, $1,035,000);

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I think I should explain a few of the changes which have been made in the bill.

The amount of the bill as it passed the House was $1,032,154,612. The net increase recommended by the Senate committee was only $629,503, and $400,000 of that increase was due to an item which had been furnished by the Budget and recommended by the President, which came in after the House had passed the bill and was not considered by the House at all, the item being an item of $400,000 for putting another machine in the air-mail clipper service between America and Europe, which I will explain in just a moment.

The amount of the bill as reported by the Senate committee is $1,032,784,115, which, as I have stated, is only $629,503 more than the amount appropriated by the House.

The amount of the regular and supplemental estimates for 1941 was $1,044,000,000, in round figures, and the amount of the appropriation for 1940, in the Post Office and Treasury appropriation bill, was $1,772,000,000. The increase appears to be very large, but it is not as large as it seems to be, for the reason that $580,000,000 for social security, which is appropriated as a social-security fund, has by previous law been made a continuing appropriation, and that item is not contained in the bill before us.

There are two departments covered by the pending bill, the Treasury Department and the Post Office Department, and the appropriations for the Treasury Department are under the appropriations for 1940 by $739,000,000, in round figures. The appropriation is under the estimate for 1941 by $11,262,000. The total appropriation for the Treasury under the bill as passed by the House was $218,691,000, and as reported to the Senate is $218,652,000, in round figures.

The regular estimates for 1941 amounted to $226,748,000, in round figures. The bill as reported to the Senate is $8,096,647 under the estimates; and it is $759,905,530.05 under the appropriations for 1940. But it must be remembered that from that must be taken the $580,000,000 of social-security funds.

There are perhaps only half a dozen amendments to the Treasury appropriation bill. There are fewer amendments made by the Senate committee than in the case of any bill with which I have had anything to do in the 21 years I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations. The bill not only carries less than was appropriated last year, but less than the estimates, and it seems to me it is a very excellent bill.

As to the Post Office appropriation bill, the amount appropriated by the House was $813,463,082, and there have been increases by the Senate committee of $669,000, and the amount as reported to the Senate is $814,132,082, instead of $813,463,082, as passed in the House.

The amount of the regular and supplemental estimates for 1941 was $817,000,000, in round figures. The amount of the appropriations last year was $794,000,000, in round figures. Therefore the post office bill is under the estimates for 1941 by $3,165,000, in round figures, and it exceeds the appropriations for 1940 by $20,000,000.

Now I come to the several items which constitute the changes. The first one is an item in the appropriation for the Procurement Division, which has been added by the Senate committee, amounting to $60,503. They asked for a great deal more, and the testimony before the committee called for a great deal more, but the item of $60,503 was added to the bill by the Senate committee because there have been employed in that office—which, by the way, is a very busy and a very efficient office—a number of temporary employees, paid out of relief funds and other special funds. The $60,503 is merely to continue those employees permanently, and it was shown that they were needed.

The next item is one in which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] is interested, and we need not discuss that. It was decided to send it to conference for reasons which will be explained later.

The next item is a decrease of $100,000. This is an item which the House inserted, for the construction of a Coast Guard Station on Lake St. Clair, Mich., amounting to $100,000. After learning all the facts, the committee was of the view that that item should be stricken out, and therefore an appropriation of $100,000 was stricken out.

So the Treasury appropriation bill comes before the Senate calling for appropriations $39,000 lower than those agreed to by the House.

In the Post Office appropriation bill there were several items of increase, to which I shall now refer.

In the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General work has been in progress in addition to the regular work the assistant superintendent had been doing for some time, and a requisition was made for an extra clerk at $2,600. On the showing made before the committee, it was determined to allow this extra clerk in the office of the Second Assistant, and that increase of $2,600 was allowed.

The office of the Solicitor of the Post Office Department has to do with the prosecution of mail fraud cases, and it is a very busy division of the Post Office Department. As these frauds have been on the increase, and the office is behind in its work, they are asking for an increase of $25,000 for the employment of several additional lawyers and stenographers.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. It has been my observation that most of the departments and bureaus of the Government are "overlawyered." I am curious to ascertain how many lawyers this office has now.

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment I will get the figure. Does the Senator mean the whole Department.

Mr. McNARY. No; in the Division about which the Senator is now speaking.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will have the figure for the Senator in just a moment. The committee felt that what was asked for was too much, and they allowed only 3 extra employees, whereas about 11 were requested.

Mr. McNARY. What compensation did the committee allow?

Mr. McKELLAR. The total was $8,020 for all three; one at $3,800, one at $2,600, and a third at $1,620. I think that was less than one-third of what was requested.

Mr. McNARY. Was this matter brought to the attention of the House committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it was, and the House disallowed it. The Senate committee allowed the item in the sum of $8,020.

Mr. McNARY. Was there a Budget estimate for it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes. Another item, a small one, relates to the Bureau of Accounts, an item of $2,080. That was due to a mistake made by the House committee, I am informed.

In the office of the First Assistant Postmaster General there was an additional item of $100,000. That was for miscellaneous items in the Post Office Department. There are over 4,000 post offices which made necessary that requirement, and we thought the evidence sustained the request, and the committee allowed it.

The next item is one of $400,000, which is the largest item in the bill. That is for the purpose of adding an airplane to the clipper service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Where is that ship to fly?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is going to fly across the Atlantic Ocean from the American coast. It depends on the weather as to when it will fly and where it will fly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will it stop at Bermuda?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the purpose is not to have it stop at Bermuda. That is one of the purposes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the Senator, then, if the purpose is not to have it stop at Bermuda, would the Senator have any objection to an amendment withholding any part of this $400,000 from aircraft which do stop at Bermuda, except in case of a forced landing?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that would be unwise, and I think, when the Senator hears what the situation is, he will agree with the statement that it would be unwise to insert such an amendment in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the operation of these clipper ships the carriage of mail is for the convenience of the inhabitants of Bermuda and the British Government, and for the convenience of the tourist trade, as well as for the improvement of the mail service generally; and it is true, is it not, that the British authorities have stopped American aircraft, even those carrying American ambassadors, holding them up more or less indefinitely, rifling the mail, confiscating what portion of it they please to confiscate? The State Department has protested at some length against that practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. All of that is true.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me Congress should not at this time be going ahead appropriating money for an extension of the very service interference with which we are protesting.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to make an explanation of the matter, I shall be glad then to yield.

The Atlantic clipper service of the Pan American Airways was actually begun under the authorization of Congress last July. For the first 5 months it did not pay; they were just getting the service instituted, and naturally it did not pay as much as the so-called subsidy provides. But in December it did pay, and paid quite a sum. It paid in the neighborhood of $250,000, as I recall.

In January there have been stoppages and difficulties of several kinds. The ships have been stopped at Bermuda, which has delayed the service and, of course, interfered with the business.

In addition to that, the very cold weather in the North Atlantic required the ships to go south, and some of them have left from Miami and some have landed at Miami.

It may be that more of the trips will have to be made from southern ports, but it is believed from the evidence which came before us that these trips may be made from New York and even from Norfolk direct to the Azores, which are under the control of Portugal. I think from the evidence it was shown that the distance is about 2,200 miles, and it is believed that these clippers, especially the new ones, can make the trip directly from New York to the Azores.

I will say to the Senator from Missouri if that is done there will be no question of examination of mails or anything else against which our Secretary of State has protested and against which the American people generally have protested.

In the next place, the service has been remarkably successful, although the Atlantic Ocean is probably the most turbulent ocean of all, especially the North Atlantic. Although this clipper service has been in existence now for nearly 7½ months, there have been no accidents of any kind, and I hope to Heaven there will not be. The service seems to be conducted in a very safe and efficient manner.

It is believed by those who testified before the committee that instead of being an expense to the American Government, certainly by next July the service would show a profit to the Government. In view of the fact that the service has been so successful, so necessary, so popular, and that so many people use it both as a passenger service and a mail service, and especially because of the fact that the mail service is increasing all the time, an additional ship is desired. Witnesses appeared before the Budget Director, and the Budget Director recommended an additional ship, which would cost initially $400,000, and that is where the $400,000 increase, the principal increase, is made.

I hope that explanation will be satisfactory to the Senator from Missouri and to other Senators.

I now yield to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT].

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, I do not think any assurance was given that these ships could be flown from this country to the Azores without stopping at Bermuda. Certainly nothing of that kind appears in the Senate hearings. My impression is that while they hoped to be able to do it, there was no assurance of that kind. Of course, they can fly direct to the Azores by the northern route from Newfoundland, but there you would have the question, of course, of the mail being censored in Newfoundland. You would have another British stopping place there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I will say to the Senator I have been informed since this matter was before the committee that it is not only hoped, but it is believed the trip from New York to the Azores directly can be made. I hope very much that it can be made, and I think we should do all we can to provide that service.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KING. In view of the turbulent conditions in Europe and the uncertainty of our ships being permitted to land at ports where it might be advantageous for them to land, does the Senator believe it is necessary at the present time to authorize another ship at the expense of the Government for what is in the nature of an experiment?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is hardly an experiment at the present time. Concerning the place of landing of the ship, let me say there is more uncertainty about the place of starting and landing on our own shores than there is on foreign shores, because it is very thoroughly believed that the airships, and especially this new airship, can go to the Azores. If the new airship goes to the Azores they will all go to the Azores, and thus avoid conflicts of the kind mentioned by the distinguished Senator from Missouri a few minutes ago.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The landing of these ships at Bermuda is not simply for the benefit of the people who live in Bermuda. It is for the accommodation of United States citizens who want to go to Bermuda and come back from Bermuda.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. And I do not think that the Senate should act directly as a result of irritation, because of the fact that occasionally the mails are inspected.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, that is not the question at all.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand the Senator is not raising it; but it is the question of the Senator from Missouri and others who are insisting that the ships not be permitted to land at Bermuda if they carry mails and the mails are examined by British authorities. It seems to me we ought not to cripple a service, if it is a necessary or desirable service, simply because the British inspect some mails.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely correct.

The next item is for an increase in the Star Route Service to the extent of $50,000. Under the orders of the Interstate Commerce Commission certain short lines of railroad are being discontinued. Where that occurs it is necessary to have a mail route, and a star mail route is provided instead of the former railway-mail route.

The next item of $55,000 is for the purpose of securing a larger vessel for service in the Aleutian Islands. We have a vessel there which carries the mail to various islands off the coast of Alaska. The boat we have now for that purpose is not large enough to carry, with reasonable comfort and in sufficient number, those passengers who want to use it to go from one island to the other.

A very strong appeal was made not only by the Delegate from Alaska but by the post-office authorities themselves, and the committee felt that since these islands were a long distance away, and were under our control, and inasmuch as there were 8,000 or 9,000 people living on those islands, they ought to have this facility, especially as it would mean the addition to the bill of only $55,000. For that reason the item was added.

Another item, and the last item that needs to be mentioned, is one for rent, light, fuel, and water in the office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. The item was increased by $50,000 because the officials of that Department came before the committee and said it was absolutely necessary to have that amount in order to do the work required by law, and for the payment of rent of buildings used by the postal service in various parts of the country.

I again say that there are fewer changes in this bill than in any bill carrying post-office appropriations that has come from the House in a long time, and I hope the Senate will agree to them. I ask that the amendments be stated.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I am curious to know if the able Senator has the data which I sought a few minutes ago?

Mr. McKELLAR. There are 16 attorneys in the Solicitor's Office of the Post Office Department. As the Senator knows, that office investigates cases involving the use of the mails to defraud. Many cases arise throughout the country from the use of the mails to defraud. Quite a number of lawyers are required to do the work.

I think the Senator is correct in his position. We probably have all the lawyers that are necessary, if they were properly distributed in the Government. The witness who appeared before the committee and presented the facts made a very excellent case. If the Senator will look through the hearings I feel sure he will agree that the three additional employees that were allowed, the stenographer and the two extra lawyers, represent a proper allowance to be made, and we will take it to conference and thresh it out with the House if the Senator from Oregon is willing.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am frank to observe that we have in the departments and bureaus here a surplus of lawyers receiving large compensations, who are unable to do more than make a living in their own home towns. In this particular instance I shall let the item go by, because I am not prepared to meet it. But I expect to give some attention along that line in connection with the other appropriation measures.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator address himself for a moment to the amendments found on page 40? I am not conversant with the items or the reasons for the changes, but I shall have to suggest the absence of a quorum when we reach those amendments, because there is some opposition to the change that is manifest in the attitude of the Senate committee in overturning the position of the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] is also interested in that particular matter. Let me explain why the amendments were made.

Mr. McNARY. Just a moment, please. I have no knowledge of the subject, but I think we can save a little time. I know that two Senators wish to oppose the amendment. I am just saying that I shall suggest the absence of a quorum when we reach that point, and then the Senator can make his explanation. I do not ask for it myself.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a very simple thing.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, if the Senator desires, he may proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me make the explanation at this point. The language is as follows:

> No part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1941 for the purchase of any standard typewriting machines, except bookkeeping and billing machines, at a price in excess of the following for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: Ten inches (correspondence models), $70.

And so on through the list. We asked the procurement officers who testified before the committee what prices they paid for these machines.

It seems that they are all now secured through the procurement office. The witness said that the highest price was paid in each particular. In other words, while he did not claim so, the committee was of the opinion that under the language of the bill the price was fixed at the highest price; namely, at $70 for the first one, and $75 for the next one, $77.50 for the next one, and $82.50 for the next one. The highest price named in the statute was always fixed for them. In other words, the Congress itself fixes the prices at which these machines are bought.

After consideration the committee reduced each of those classes by the sum of $10, for the purpose of taking it to the Senate and to the House, so that the committee could find out just what the facts were, so the matter could be dealt with intelligently. We did not have the information on which to act, and could not do other than take the matter to conference and work it out there, if it needed to be worked out. If these are reasonable, proper, and advantageous prices, considering the cost of material and the cost of manufacture, they should be left as they are. That was the suggestion that was made in the committee. When the item is reached, of course, I shall be very happy to have a quorum call and let any Senator who wishes to make an explanation do so.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The report is as follows:

"Ten inches (correspondence models), $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $77.50; 16 inches, $82.50; 18 inches, $87.50; 20 inches, $94; 22 inches, $95; 24 inches, $97.50; 26 inches, $103.50; 28 inches, $104; 30 inches, $105; 32 inches, $107.50; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches, $80; 12 inches, $85; 14 inches, $90; 18 inches, $95."

And the following inserted in lieu thereof: "Ten inches (correspondence models), $60; 12 inches, $65; 14 inches, $67.50; 16 inches, $72.50; 18 inches, $77.50; 20 inches, $84; 22 inches, $85; 24 inches, $87.50; 26 inches, $93.50; 28 inches, $94; 30 inches, $95; 32 inches, $97.50; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: Ten inches, $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $80; 18 inches, $85."

The effect of this amendment is to reduce by $10 the maximum prices which the Government has heretofore paid for different models of typewriters.

It is recommended by the committee that the following language be added to the bill:

": (a) A meeting of a technical committee for transit of the Universal Postal Union, $5,000, to be immediately available, (b) a special Congress of the Universal Postal Union, $10,000."

This provision does not increase the amount of the appropriation but merely restores the authority to expend from the appropriation the amounts stated for expenses of delegates to attend (a) a meeting of a technical committee and (b) a special congress.

On account of the European war, of course, the meeting of the technical committee has been postponed, and it is presumed that it will not be held until after the war is over. The special congress is contingent upon the meeting in question. Without doubt, these two items were eliminated upon the assumption that the meeting and congress cannot be held within the time that the appropriation would be available. However, if the war should be terminated within a year or longer it is quite possible that the authority would be needed. If the war in Europe continues, it will not be used.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the bill contains the same provision which has been carried for the past year with respect to the use of jute and cotton twine in the Post Office Department. I have no intention of endeavoring to change that provision. However, I should like the opportunity of making a very brief statement so that the latest figures regarding the relative cost of the two types of twine may be printed in the RECORD.

An analysis of the actual cost of jute twine purchased in the fiscal years 1930 to 1939, compared with the cost of cotton twine, indicates that in those 10 years a saving of $1,126,337 was obtained, or an average annual saving of almost $115,000, as compared with what the cost would have been had cotton twine been used.

The average cost of cotton twine was $201.28 per million yards, as compared to $134.23 per million yards for jute twine. The advent of European hostilities has materially increased the price of all twine, and that of cotton to a relatively greater extent than that of jute. On June 19, 1939, the lowest bid price for jute was 11.3 cents per pound, and for cotton 16.5 cents per pound. On February 5, 1940, the lowest bid price for jute was 16.9 cents per pound, f. o. b. Allentown, Pa. The improved cotton twine was 26.98 cents per pound f. o. b. Cleveland, and 33½ cents per pound f. o. b. Macon, Ga.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. DAVIS. I have been following with interest the remarks which the Senator has been making on the jute question. The Senator mentioned Allentown, Pa. If this paragraph is enacted into law it will practically mean the dismissal of many workers in that section.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

I think it is interesting to realize that if all the twine used by the Post Office Department were made from cotton, only three one-thousandths of 1 percent of the cotton crop would be consumed, and the effect on the cotton surplus would not be material.

Moreover, it is interesting to be informed by the Post Office officials, as we were in the Appropriations Committee, that only one mill making cotton twine is interested in bidding on cotton twine. The reason given to us was that other mills have so many other orders on hand that it is not really worth their while to take on the business of making cotton twine. Of course, that is not true in the case of mills which manufacture jute twine. They are very much interested. The Government order means much to them, and from that standpoint I think there is an interesting contrast.

Mr. President, I conclude by saying that this is one way in which the Government can effect economies. The jute twine is in every way adequate to the demands made upon it, and it is certainly much cheaper.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a statement to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with respect to twine. We had this question under consideration for many years. Finally it was decided several years ago that the following provision should be added to the bill:

> Not more than three-fourths of the funds herein appropriated for the purchase of twine shall be expended in the purchase of twine manufactured from materials or commodities outside the United States.

Mr. Parkman, the official who had charge of the twine department, testified that cotton twine is in every way as good as jute twine, and he thinks perhaps it is somewhat better. He thinks it is stronger, and that there is no reason in the world why it should not be used. Cotton is produced in this country. Jute is produced abroad and must be imported. It seems to me that the provision in the bill, that not more than three-fourths of the funds for twine shall be used for the purchase of jute, which comes from abroad, is very reasonable, and I hope it may be agreed to, as the committee agreed to it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I stated that I was not offering any amendment or seeking to change the bill. I merely wanted the RECORD to show some of the recent facts in the situation.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I am in accord with what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has just stated. At this time I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to the paragraph in the bill reading:

> Not more than three-fourths of the funds herein appropriated for the purchase of twine shall be expended in the purchase of twine manufactured from materials or commodities outside the United States.

This language may be found on page 55 of the bill.

The paragraph to which I refer was inserted in the Post Office Department appropriation measure in the Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, and appears in the present bill.

Regardless of the claim that cotton twine has proven itself equally serviceable with jute twine for post-office uses, in my opinion, this is not so. Postal employees claim that it stretches, thus rendering it not entirely safe in tying up packages; and also that it cuts the hands of those who have to use it.

Each time the Post Office Department requested bids in 1939 on a new type of cotton twine which would neither stretch nor cut the hands of employees using it, no bids were received. All bids in 1939 were on the old type cotton twine.

This is important, because this form of legislation is running the cost of Government above normal. The proviso in question caused the buying last year of 360,000,000 yards of cotton twine, which cost the Government 159 percent more per million yards than did jute twine. To put it in actual figures, it meant an added expenditure of $35,000 to the Post Office Department. It is my understanding that the purchase of 360,000,000 yards of cotton twine at the added cost heretofore stated showed no appreciable benefit to our cotton growers or cotton manufacturers. If we figured it in bales it would total about 720 bales net, an infinitesimal amount in the sight of the 13,000,000 bale crop. Another item of cost on account of the asking of bids in June, September, October, and December totals $64,000.

While it is desirable at all times to buy American goods if there is anything substantial to be gained by the producers thereof, this provision will cost close to $100,000 additional on a purchase of $327,000. Of course, everyone knows that this burden falls upon the American taxpayer.

It should be remembered that the manufacture of jute twine, together with other jute products, is essentially an American industry and the use of jute twine is a big item to the manufacturers. It is, however, a small item to the cotton grower. While it is true that the source of raw jute is in foreign countries, its manufacture, I repeat, is wholly American. Therefore, it would seem inadvisable to disturb that industry and simultaneously impose an additional expense of $100,000 on the Government, which apparently would be without substantial benefit to anyone.

The safety factor with regard to that which must be tied and those who do the tying should also weigh in this instance, particularly in the light of the undesirable and very sizeable expenditure.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have a brief explanation of the amendment found on page 41 with regard to strategic and critical materials, in which $5,000,000 has been made immediately available.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a request was made to make the entire appropriation available. The Department wanted to use the entire $12,500,000. Last year the amount was $10,000,000, and the House increased it this year to $12,500,000, but had nothing to say about its being made immediately available. However, the Department sent in a request to have the whole amount of $12,500,000—or, as it was then, of $15,000,000—made immediately available. The committee disagreed, and after an investigation with the Department officials, although they earnestly asked that the whole amount be immediately available, the committee reduced the amount to be made immediately available to $5,000,000. I wish to read a letter from the President stating the reasons for the request:

FEBRUARY 14, 1940.

The President of the Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for the consideration of Congress a draft of a proposed provision pertaining to an item for the Treasury Department in the Budget for the fiscal year 1941, as follows:

To the text of the item "Strategic and critical materials, Procurement Division, act of June 7, 1939," appearing on page 750 of the Budget, insert the following phrase immediately following the amount of the estimate, $15,000,000 "to be immediately available."

Since the Budget was transmitted to Congress I have received a report from the Interdepartmental Committee on Strategic Materials which emphasizes the following considerations:

1. Commercial stocks in this country of many vital raw materials are now considerably below normal.

2. Prices of most of the desired items are more favorable at present than for some time past.

3. Difficulties in both supply and transportation, as well as higher prices, are likely to be encountered if the present war continues and increases in intensity.

4. In the event of unlimited warfare on sea and in the air, possession of a reserve of these essential supplies might prove of vital importance not only in the national defense but in strengthening the policy of neutrality.

5. The materials to be purchased can at any time be converted into cash, and in the event of an emergency they will be worth much more than their cost.

In view of these facts, and inasmuch as the appropriation provided for the present fiscal year will shortly be exhausted, I believe that it is in the national interest that the appropriation in the full amount recommended by me, namely, $15,000,000, be made immediately available.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Under those circumstances the committee took the matter up with the Department, and after a careful examination reported the bill with $5,000,000 of the amount immediately available.

O'MAHONEY AMENDMENT EFFECTS SUBSTANTIAL SAVING

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, when the bill was under consideration before the Committee on Appropriations questions were asked with respect to the effect of an amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] and adopted in the appropriation bill of last year, relating to the transmission of penalty matter through the mail. The amendment of the Senator from Wyoming imposed a limitation which had a very desirable effect. In order that the Senate may be informed, I should like to have printed in the RECORD at this point the colloquy between myself and Mr. North, of the Post Office Department, explaining the effect of the O'Mahoney amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement is as follows:

PENALTY MAIL—O'MAHONEY AMENDMENT TO 1940 ACT

Senator HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, when the question of subsidies and other items was under consideration last year I remember Senator O'MAHONEY offered an amendment to the bill which would tend to reduce the volume of Government printing. That item had grown tremendously. I think 20 years ago it was about $9,000,000. In 1935 it was $31,000,000; in 1936, $32,000,000; in 1937 it was $34,000,000; in 1938 it was $35,000,000; in 1939 it was $38,000,000; as compared to the congressional mail, which has averaged about $750,000 a year right along, and in an election year is about $1,000,000. It costs 38 times as much, according to these figures, to carry Department mail as it does to carry congressional mail. Is there anyone here—Mr. North or anyone else—who can testify as to what has been the effect of the O'Mahoney amendment upon the volume of departmental mail matter?

REDUCTIONS EXPERIENCED UNDER O'MAHONEY AMENDMENT

Mr. NORTH. Yes, gentlemen. The O'Mahoney amendment became effective, as you know, July 1; and we have had one quarter's report pursuant to the requirements of that amendment. I may say that we have received reports from practically all agencies and departments concerned. From the figures we have for the one quarter, raised to the yearly level, it would appear that for this year there will be 682,000,000 pieces, as compared with 970,000,000 pieces for the previous fiscal year.

Senator MCKELLAR. I did not get those figures.

Mr. NORTH. Roughly raising it to the level of a year from one quarter's report, we would have 682,000,000 pieces as compared with 970,000,000 pieces for the previous fiscal year, or 67,000,000 pounds as compared to 90,000,000 pounds for the previous year.

Senator MCKELLAR. That is a very considerable reduction; is it not?

Mr. NORTH. That indicates either some recession of activities or, through the means of the O'Mahoney amendment, they are becoming more conscious of the large volume of free mail.

ESTIMATED REDUCTION IN COST OF HANDLING PENALTY MAIL

Senator HAYDEN. On that basis, then, instead of costing $38,000,000 to perform this service as it did in 1939, it certainly should cost less than $30,000,000.

Mr. NORTH. Yes.

Senator HAYDEN. What would be your estimate?

Mr. NORTH. About $28,000,000 to $30,000,000, I should say, according to that proration.

Senator HAYDEN. Then, as a result of the action taken by the committee and Congress, there would be a saving to the Post Office Department of at least $8,000,000 in the fiscal year?

Mr. NORTH. It is so indicated by the figures; yes, Senator.

* * * * * * *

EFFECT OF O'MAHONEY AMENDMENT

Senator HAYDEN. Perhaps, then, it might be said that the effect of the O'Mahoney amendment was to direct the attention of the heads of departments to the enormous amount of matter that was going through the mails, and cause them to ease down in the volume produced.

There is a double saving to the Government in that. There is the net saving, whatever it may be. You say that at postal rates $38,000,000 would have been due for something of which the actual out-of-pocket cost was around $14,000,000 to $15,000,000, whatever it may be. Whatever the net saving, that is a saving to the Government in your operating costs in cash. On the other hand, it costs money to buy paper, and it costs money to have it printed or mimeographed, and it costs money to hire stenographers and all the help, both personal and mechanical, that the departments have; and a reduction to any extent in the volume of it would be ultimately reflected in the Treasury in that respect just as well as it would be in your actual operating costs.

THE TEXT OF THE O'MAHONEY AMENDMENT

Mr. HAYDEN. The amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Wyoming, which became law as a part of the Post Office Department Appropriation Act last May, is as follows:

SEC. 6. On and after July 1, 1939, no executive department or independent establishment of the Government shall transmit through the mail, free of postage, any book, report, periodical, bulletin, pamphlet, list, or other article or document (except official letter correspondence, mail concerning the sale of Government securities, and all forms and blanks necessary in the administration of such departments and establishments), unless a request therefor has been previously received by such department or independent establishment or such transmission is required by law. For each quarter, beginning with the quarter commencing July 1, 1939, the head of each independent establishment and executive department (other than the Post Office Department) shall submit to the Postmaster General, within 30 days after the close of the quarter, a statement of the weight of the mail matter by classes of mail that the independent establishment or department has transmitted free of postage during such quarter, and he shall also certify to the Postmaster General at the end of each such quarter that nothing was transmitted through the mail free of postage by the independent establishment or department in violation of the provisions of this section: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to prohibit the mailing free of postage of lists of agricultural bulletins or of lists of public documents which are offered for sale by the Superintendent of Documents: Provided further, That this prohibition shall not apply to the transmission of such books, reports, periodicals, bulletins, pamphlets, lists, articles, or documents to educational institutions or public libraries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 11, after the word "Commandant", to strike out "$40,845,775" and insert "$40,745,775", and, in line 12, before the word "and", to strike out "$36,614,440" and insert "$36,516,440", so as to read:

Total, Coast Guard, exclusive of Office of Commandant, $40,745,775 (composed of "A" item, $36,516,440, and "B" item, $4,229,335).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 31, line 24, after the numerals "1939", to insert a semicolon and "but such designations when combined for an appropriation or an amount limitation shall not be deemed to require separate administrative or fund accounting for each designation", so as to read:

When used herein under the heading "Coast Guard", the words in parentheses ("A" item) and ("B" item) shall mean, respectively, "amounts for or relating to regular activities" and "amounts for or relating to activities pursuant to Executive Order No. 8254, dated September 18, 1939"; but such designations when combined for an appropriation or an amount limitation shall not be deemed to require separate administrative or fund accounting for each designation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Procurement Division", on page 38, line 3, after the word "Division" and the parenthesis, to strike out "$628,470" and insert "$688,973", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For the Director of Procurement and other personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field service, and for miscellaneous expenses, including office supplies and materials, purchase and exchange of motortrucks and maintenance thereof, telegrams, telephone service, traveling expenses, office equipment, fuel, light, electric current, and other expenses for carrying into effect regulations governing the procurement, warehousing, and distribution by the Procurement Division of the Treasury Department of property, equipment, stores, and supplies in the District of Columbia and in the field (including not to exceed $500 to settle claims for damages caused to private property by motor vehicles used by the Procurement Division), $688,973:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 12, after the words "to wit" and the colon, to strike out, "10 inches (correspondence models), $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $77.50; 16 inches, $82.50; 18 inches, $87.50; 20 inches, $94; 22 inches, $95; 24 inches, $97.50; 26 inches, $103.50; 28 inches, $104; 30 inches, $105; 32 inches, $107.50; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches, $80; 12 inches, $85; 14 inches, $90; 18 inches, $95" and insert "10 inches (correspondence models), $60; 12 inches, $65; 14 inches, $67.50; 16 inches, $72.50; 18 inches, $77.50; 20 inches, $84; 22 inches, $85; 24 inches, $87.50; 26 inches, $93.50; 28 inches, $94; 30 inches, $95; 32 inch, $97.50; or, for standard typewriting machine distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches, $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $80; 18 inches, $85", so as to read:

No part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used during the fiscal year 1941 for the purchase of any standard typewriting machines, except bookkeeping and billing machines, at a price in excess of the following for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches (correspondence models), $60; 12 inches, $65; 14 inches, $67.50; 16 inches, $72.50; 18 inches, $77.50; 20 inches, $84; 22 inches, $85; 24 inches, $87.50; 26 inches, $93.50; 28 inches, $94; 30 inches, $95; 32 inches, $97.50; or, for standard typewriting machines distinctively quiet in operation, the maximum prices shall be as follows for models with carriages which will accommodate paper of the following widths, to wit: 10 inches, $70; 12 inches, $75; 14 inches, $80; 18 inches, $85.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I desire to speak briefly in opposition to this committee amendment.

Examination of the hearings seems to me to disclose the fact that this is almost an arbitrary reduction. To me it is a surprising, if not an amazing, amendment. I am not too familiar with the history of governmental purchases of typewriters; but I understand that some time ago, prior to the World War, as a result of a finding on the part of members of the House Committee on Appropriations that various prices were being paid by the Government, legislation was enacted to provide that not more than $70 could be paid for a typewriter.

I am greatly concerned about the amendment, because its adoption would seriously affect the economic and industrial situation in my State. Many thousand persons in Connecticut are employed in the manufacture of typewriters.

This type of machine, for which the Federal Government is the largest customer, sells to the public for $115.50.

Some years ago, for reasons which are quite obvious, the typewriter companies made a special price to business colleges or business schools. I think later, as a result of the action to which I have referred, the Government was able to obtain the advantage of that price. As a result, insofar as the Government is concerned, a ceiling was placed on the cost of typewriters. Since that time the Government, as well as business schools, has been able to buy typewriters for $70, while the public has paid $115.50 for new machines. It seems to me that those engaged in business, and who buy typewriters are compelled to absorb losses incurred in the sales to the Federal Government. I think it possible that the Government has cheated itself by putting a ceiling on the price of typewriters.

The statement may be made that bid prices on typewriters are the same or comparable. It could not be otherwise, because of the fact that the Government will not permit a bid in excess of $70. Obviously, the typewriter people are compelled to sell typewriters to the Government; so, if the bid price is $70, it is something that private industry cannot do anything about, unless, it seems to me, the companies are willing to lose money on Government sales.

I think it is outrageous—and I do not say that disrespectfully—to reduce, arbitrarily, the price of typewriters $10. It may very seriously dislocate this great industry. It seems to me a certainty that it will make necessary a great loss on the part of the typewriter manufacturers; and while the explanation has been made that the purpose of the amendment was to obtain facts, I think one giving a little serious thought to the matter finds the answer and the facts for himself.

If we do this thing in connection with the purchase of typewriters, why stop there? Why not fix a ceiling on everything the Government purchases? Why not do it on battleships, or airplanes, or other kinds of business machines, or anything for which the Government may have a need? I think it is a dangerous thing to do. I think it is a terribly unfair thing to do in the instance of this very important industry.

I am very hopeful that the Senate will reject the committee amendment. I think this brief explanation of mine, telling how the Congress originally arrived at the price of $70, is probably the explanation that the committee and the Senate require; and I am very hopeful that the members of the Appropriations Committee will not insist upon the inclusion of this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. MALONEY. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to say to the Senator that the purpose of this amendment was to take this item to conference. We did not know it was going to be discussed on the floor, and we did not know what the facts were; but when we were apprised of the fact that all the various types of typewriters are sold at exactly the same price, it looked to me and to some of the rest of us as if we were establishing by law a trust in the case of typewriters; and this amendment was put in for the purpose of ascertaining just what had been done.

We had no evidence on which to uphold this amendment. It was put in for the purpose of obtaining information. Upon the information the Senator has given us—which I cannot controvert, because I do not know what the facts are—I have no personal objection to the amendment going out.

Mr. MALONEY. That pleases me very much, Mr. President. I am very grateful to the senior Senator from Tennessee who is always fair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 21, after the word "expended", to insert a comma and "and of which amount $5,000,000 shall be immediately available"; so as to read:

Strategic and critical materials: For all necessary expenses for the acquisition, transportation, maintenance, storage, and rotation of strategic and critical materials in accordance with sections 1 to 6, inclusive, of the act of June 7, 1939 (Public, No. 117, 76th Cong.), including personal services and rental and maintenance of storage space in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; payment of part-time or intermittent employment in the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, of such scientists and technicists as may be contracted for by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, at a rate of pay not exceeding $25 per diem for any person so employed; printing and binding; and traveling expenses; $12,500,000, to continue available until expended, and of which amount $5,000,000 shall be immediately available:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II—Post Office Department—Salaries in Bureaus and Offices", on page 42, line 23, to increase the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia under the Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, from $585,000 to $587,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 4, to increase the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia under the office of the Solicitor for the Post Office Department, from $111,300 to $119,320.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, at the end of line 7, to increase the appropriation for personal services in the District of Columbia under the Bureau of Accounts, from $111,240 to $114,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contingent expenses, Post Office Department," on page 43, line 21, before the word "convention", to strike out "London" and insert "Cairo"; so as to read:

For contingent and miscellaneous expenses; stationery and blank books, index and guide cards, folders and binding devices, including purchase of free penalty envelopes; telegraph and telephone service, furniture and filing cabinets and repairs thereto; purchase, exchange, maintenance, and repair of tools, electrical supplies, typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices; maintenance of motortrucks and of two motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes (one for the Postmaster General and one for the general use of the Department); streetcar fares; floor coverings; postage stamps for correspondence addressed abroad, which is not exempt under article 49 of the Cairo convention of the Universal Postal Union; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, railway guides, city directories, and books necessary to conduct the business of the Department; newspapers, not exceeding $200; expenses, except membership fees, of attendance at meetings or conventions concerned with postal affairs, when incurred on the written authority of the Postmaster General, not exceeding $2,000; expenses of the purchasing agent and of the Solicitor and attorneys connected with his office while traveling on business of the Department, not exceeding $800; and other expenses not otherwise provided for, $84,388.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the First Assistant Postmaster General", on page 48, line 20, after the word "appropriations", to strike out "$1,700,000" and insert "$1,800,000"; so as to read:

Miscellaneous items, first- and second-class post offices: For miscellaneous items necessary and incidental to the operation and protection of post offices of the first and second classes, and the business conducted in connection therewith, not provided for in other appropriations, $1,800,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 48, line 20, striking out "$1,700,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$1,800,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 16, after the word "law", to strike out "$15,674,149" and insert "$16,074,-149", so as to read:

Foreign air mail transportation: For transportation of foreign mails by aircraft, as authorized by law, $16,074,149.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment. I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 49, line 17, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a semicolon and the following:

Provided, That no part of the money appropriated under this item shall be expended for transportation of foreign mails by any aircraft landing on the island of Bermuda (except in the case of forced landings) while a proclamation issued under authority of section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act of 1939, and naming the United Kingdom, is in effect and while the Government of the United Kingdom asserts any alleged right to stop American ships or aircraft and examine and confiscate mail.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri obtained the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know the Senator is one of the best parliamentarians in either branch of Congress. I do not think he has a superior anywhere——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his kind words.

Mr. McKELLAR. And I am wondering whether this amendment is not legislation, and I should like to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair as to whether it is not legislation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, in order to obviate any suggestion to it being subject to a point of order, I modify my amendment by striking out the words "ships or", so as to make it relate purely to aircraft, and make it apply specifically to the appropriation in this item. I think certainly the Senator from Tennessee will not insist that that is subject to a point of order, being a pure limitation on the funds appropriated under this very item.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sure about the matter; therefore, I ask the Chair for a ruling.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that what the Senator proposes would be only a limitation on the appropriation, and it is in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. To strike out the two words?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I modify my amendment by striking out the words "ships or."

I do not desire to detain the Senate unduly about this matter, because it is something with which we are all familiar. Last week we occupied the better part of 2 days in this body in a debate on the question of whether or not the economy-minded Committee on Appropriations should be sustained in cutting by a million dollars an appropriation involving all of the airplanes of the United States—commercial, National Guard, Army, Marine Corps, Navy, and privately owned planes. Yet today we find the same economy-minded committee coming in, and, in behalf of the particular favorite, as it seems, of the United States Government, the Pan American Air Lines, casually tossing off $400,000 for another additional weekly trip to Europe.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator understands, of course, that this appropriation is being made upon the assumption that the postage collected will pay the $400,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I think it is just as easy to assume that increased safety brought about as a result of the other bill, that increased safety applying particularly during the wintertime, would increase the revenues derived from air mail sufficiently to have defrayed the expense of assuring that safety.

Mr. HAYDEN rose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am glad to yield to the Senator, although that is merely an incident in the main argument I desire to advance in support of my amendment.

Mr. HAYDEN. The point is that in the matter of the domestic air mail, while the revenues have increased very appreciably, we are still operating at a loss, whereas the trans-Atlantic mail has been surprisingly profitable.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I will ask the Senator from Arizona if that is not of most recent development. I think the Senator from Tennessee explained a moment ago that it was just within a month or two.

Mr. McKELLAR. In December they made $250,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And that was the first time they had ever paid expenses. Is not that true?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has been in operation but 5 months.

Mr. GLASS. In addition to that, they had to turn away 71 passengers whom they could not carry.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. When we authorized the establishment of the trans-Atlantic mail the fact was brought to our attention that eight times as much mail crosses the North Atlantic Ocean between the United States and Europe as is carried in the rest of the world; that is, from the great centers of population in the United States and Europe where mail congests, and where there is an opportunity to get more money out of it. We were confident, when we authorized the establishment of the trans-Atlantic mail service, that it would pay, and our confidence has been justified. We established it in May, and by December there was a profit, there being a profit of $62,000 in 1 month. With the war conditions obtaining as they are in Europe, with the impossibility, at least, of the submarining of an airplane——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. An airplane cannot be torpedoed by a submarine, but its mail can be rifled, and the mail is being rifled, over the protest of the American State Department, every time a clipper puts into a British port.

Mr. HAYDEN. The State Department, if the Senator will yield further, made the representation to the British Government, as reported in the press, that if this matter were not corrected we proposed to construct planes of capacity sufficient to enable them to leave our own shores or leave Europe and go directly to neutral islands, the Azores, and then proceed either to Europe or to the United States, and that they would not touch at British ports. My understanding is that that will be straightened out by negotiation between the Governments. What I am questioning is the wisdom of the Senator, with not all the facts before us, asking the Senate to vote for an amendment directing that a certain procedure be abandoned regardless of the negotiations which are proceeding.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In response to the Senator from Arizona, I may say that with even fewer facts before him the Senator from Arizona voted, and a majority of the Senate voted, at the last session of Congress, for a provision making an exception to the provisions of the Neutrality Act so as to permit the Pan American Air Lines to make a landing in Bermuda. For whose convenience was that? It was not for the convenience of the people of the United States who desire to communicate with Europe, and not for the convenience of people in Europe who desire to communicate with people in the United States. That was done for the convenience and the revenue of the Pan American Air Lines, because they wanted to make a stop in Bermuda, and for the convenience of the people of Bermuda, and the United Kingdom generally, who desire to have the clippers stop there, and for the convenience of a few American tourists who desire to take winter vacations in Bermuda, and would have been much better off at home picking up chips.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I cast that vote for no such reason. It is a matter of geography that Bermuda is part way across the Atlantic Ocean; it is a convenient place for the planes to stop and refuel, and, considering the size and capacity of the planes we had, it was better to proceed in that way than to try to make a longer flight. Larger and better planes are being built. The new planes to be put into service are of greater power and of greater capacity, and it is now possible to avoid Bermuda, if we do not get the right kind of treatment from the British.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Then let us say so. That is all this amendment does.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. During the World War, in which the Senator from Missouri took a very active and very honorable and splendid part, did not the United States not only reserve but exercise exactly the same right of search and seizure that England is now exercising toward us?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator wants to refer to the World War, I shall be very glad to go into that in any detail he may desire. What happened during the World War was that during a long period of time there happened just exactly what I fear may happen during this war, that the British infringed rights which we claimed and asserted, and we confined ourselves to protests by the State Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what we are doing now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Protests which too frequently were scarcely delivered; in other words, the testimony has been, and the admission of the then American Ambassador to Great Britain, as well as that of the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at that time, was that when one of these protests would arrive at London the so-called Ambassador from the United States to the Court of St. James's would take it down to Sir Edward Grey's office, and, handing the note to him, would say, "How are we going to answer it?" Without accusing the present Ambassador to the Court of St. James's of any such intention or of any such nefarious conduct, I say that this is a matter in which the British have been flagrantly violating a right which our State Department has been asserting, and that, so far as I am concerned, I am wholly unwilling to appropriate further funds to permit the British to carry out further infringement of our rights for the convenience of British subjects, and of a few Americans who want to go to Bermuda and spend a winter vacation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. When this country entered the World War, did we not assert the right and did we not do the very things against which we have protested?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If we did, Mr. President, we were in entire contradiction to the principles which we had asserted before we got into the war, when we had no interest in the matter except the protection of neutral rights.

Mr. GLASS. Which acts were in consonance with international law for over 100 years governing the right of search and seizure.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We denied that right before we got into the war, and if we changed our position after we got into the war, we stultified ourselves.

Mr. GLASS. We did the very thing against which we were protesting.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If we did that, we stultified ourselves; and what I am protesting against now is squandering American funds, $400,000, for something that is not necessary, in the economy-minded Congress, for the purpose of enabling the British Government to carry out further infringements of what our State Department asserts to be American rights.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I desire to ask the Senator a question solely for the purpose of enabling me to understand the amendment, which was rather rapidly read. Am I correct in understanding that the amendment is to make a change in the Neutrality Act of last fall, whereby we made an exception?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is to prevent the appropriation of any funds for the flying of aircraft landing in Bermuda as long as the British assert the right to search our mail.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As a practical matter, the withholding of funds would result in the abandonment of the flight?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Unless the British ceased their aggressions against American rights.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I invite the attention of the Senator to questions I asked at the time of the hearing. Mr. Lamiell was before the committee.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Who is he?

Mr. HAYDEN. He was representing the Post Office Department in connection with this matter. I asked this question:

> Senator HAYDEN. How does the British censorship compare with our own censorship during the World War on mails from neutral countries?
> Mr. LAMIELL. From the records on file with the Department it appears that it is very similar.

Senator HAYDEN. That is, we did lay hands upon mails to neutral countries, and we did censor them?

Mr. LAMIELL. The United States apparently censored anything it considered should be censored.

Senator MCKELLAR. And, so far as you are able to tell, the rules instituted by Great Britain for examining the mails are just about the same as ours were in the World War?

Mr. LAMIELL. That is my understanding, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I suggest that Mr. Lamiell, whoever he is—and I never heard of him before—ought to hold a conference with the State Department, which is officially constituted by law to present the American view of international law. The State Department has repeatedly asserted that the conduct of the British with regard to the censoring of mail is a violation of American rights. It has been a matter of common notoriety within the last week or so that an airplane returning from Europe to the United States, bearing an American Ambassador, returning, ostensibly at least, for purposes of consultation with his own Government, was held up at Bermuda while the British rifled the mail and confiscated over half of it. Away back during the administration of President Monroe there was a very serious protest when the British held up and delayed the procedure of a ship bearing the American Ambassador to the Court of Russia, John Quincy Adams, but now, within a week, by reason of the fact that our clipper just happened to stop at Bermuda, largely for the convenience of the Bermudians and the British Government, they take occasion to delay for several hours a plane bearing the American Ambassador, even though, as I have said, this particular American Ambassador was more at home on British territory, or French territory, or Russian territory than he was on American territory. Nevertheless, they did hold up that plane, rifled the mail, and confiscated about half of it. I do not think we ought to appropriate further public funds for an extension of that sort of service.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I read to the Senator this extract from the hearings in an effort to question the wisdom of the action he suggested being taken by the Senate——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is the last chance we will have.

Mr. HAYDEN. When he knows that, after all, censorship is a matter of degree. A great many things may be done, and little things may be done; it can be made easy or it can be made difficult. Our State Department is negotiating this matter with the British. We have an alternative, that if the State Department does not accomplish this purpose, we do not have to let our ships land at Bermuda.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have already appropriated this money.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, let me make it perfectly clear that it is the understanding of the members of the committee that if the State Department is not successful in having its protests recognized in a way satisfactory to the State Department, it is not necessary that the ships which we have authorized to go to Bermuda. They can go to Puerto Rico and not touch at any British port.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that be true, I do not see any objection to this amendment. I cannot help what the understanding of the committee is. Here is what the proposed law says:

Foreign air mail transportation: For transportation of foreign mails by aircraft, as authorized by law, $16,074,149.

Or an increase of $400,000, and that paragraph does not say a word about the understanding of the committee.

Mr. HAYDEN. The point I am trying to impress upon the Senator is that the strongest weapon the State Department has in inducing the British to ease up on the censorship at Bermuda is the knowledge that we have airships with which we can convey mail across the Atlantic Ocean without going to Bermuda. But it is advantageous to go by way of Bermuda, if we have the right kind of understanding with the British.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It seems to me the British will relax their regulations and cease their unlawful conduct more quickly if we say, "Very well, if you do not do so we will not go into your ports."

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. What is the amount of business we enjoy from Bermuda on each of these trans-Atlantic trips?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am unable to answer that question. I know that practically no Americans go to Bermuda except those who go down there to spend their winter vacations.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Of course, the Senator knows that the population of Bermuda is very small in the summer, but increases considerably in the wintertime.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the business would not be justified at all, if it depended on the amount of revenue received for travel from New York to Bermuda or from Bermuda to New York. That is small compared to the amount of money which is collected for the full trans-Atlantic flight.

Mr. REYNOLDS. And really the operators are not profiting by stopping at Bermuda.

Mr. HAYDEN. No. It so happens that the amount of fuel which has to be carried by the planes is less if they stop at Bermuda. If the fuel load is reduced more mail can be carried by the planes, and therefore more revenue obtained from it. If the planes carry gasoline instead of letters they do not get a proper return on the letters carried.

Mr. REYNOLDS. What is the flying distance between New York and Bermuda?

Mr. HAYDEN. I am not sure. I believe it is five or six hundred miles.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I suggest that instead of our airships going by way of Bermuda they take off from Wilmington, N. C., because Bermuda is only a short distance from Wilmington. I suggest that the officials of the Pan American Lines consider the advisability of starting from Wilmington, N. C. It certainly is a more beautiful spot than Hamilton, Bermuda.

As to the mails; I am of course extremely interested, as are all Senators, in the matter of our mails being censored. That is hurting our shipping business. Mr. Sumner Welles is reported to be sailing on the Rex, of the Italian Line, for his mission to Europe, rather than to go on one of the American Line ships which we are supporting by appropriations. I assume that Mr. Welles is not going on a ship of the American line, and preferably is traveling aboard the Rex because he does not want to wait until the British read all our mail. So this is my interest in the matter.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me while I ask another question of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. My recollection of the testimony and the representations which were made to us with reference to this Bermuda situation is different from that of both the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I was not attempting to say where the representations were made. Those representations were made in the caucus, and not only in the meeting of the full committee. We simply took the bill as it came in from the caucus to the full committee.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. We were told that unless we stopped at Bermuda we would not be able to go across the Atlantic. The question of the mails was not discussed. The question was whether we would reduce the amount of baggage and other things carried on the ships and permit larger space for gasoline.

Mr. HAYDEN. The Senator will remember that the original proposal for trans-Atlantic air mail was to fly from here to Canada, and then fly overland to Nova Scotia, and then to Newfoundland, and then fly from there to Ireland. That is the shortest crossing of the Atlantic.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. That route was to be used in the summertime. There were two routes, the summer months' route and then the route to be used during the winter months.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. And then when the route was established it was not established over the northern way. We started out over the southern route, on account of the war and other conditions in the north. But we are not landing on the other side in any belligerent country. We are landing in Portugal, and then there are in Portugal air lines by which the mail can go directly to Italy and to other countries. It does not necessarily have to go to belligerent countries at all.

The Senator will remember that it was said we could not carry the mail across the ocean unless we stopped at Bermuda. The reason why we could not carry the mails across the ocean unless we stopped there was that the longer the flight the greater the load of gasoline required to be carried. If you can break the flight, you do not have to carry so much gasoline. If you decrease the gasoline load, you can increase the mail load. So, as a matter of making it a paying proposition, it was highly desirable to stop at Bermuda.

It is possible to fly directly from Bermuda to the Azores and get across that way with the larger ships. The newer ships are larger, and that is possible to be done. I wish to repeat that under those circumstances it would seem that the State Department has all the authority it needs in dealing with the British. We can either go by way of Bermuda or not, according to how we are treated, and it is not necessary for Congress to dictate in the matter at all.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I wanted to ask the Senator from Missouri a question. What mechanics does his amendment provide for deciding when the British have acted in an unlawful manner?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think the State Department would be finally determinative of that matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I wish to address myself to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. I wish to read it to the Senate. I may say before I read it that it applies not to this $400,000 but to the entire amount of $16,074,149, and, in my judgment, it would have the effect of absolutely destroying the air service between America and Europe. I do not believe the Senate wants to do that, and I hope it will vote this amendment down.

Let me read the amendment:

Provided, That no part of the money appropriated under this item—

That means the whole item of $16,000,000—

shall be expended for transportation of foreign mails by any aircraft landing on the island of Bermuda (except in the case of forced landings) while a proclamation issued under authority of section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act of 1939, and naming the United Kingdom is in effect and while the Government of the United Kingdom asserts any alleged right to stop American aircraft and examine and confiscate mail.

Mr. President, the Bermudas, as I recall—and I will have to look to the record for absolute certainty—are about 700 miles from New York. That is about one-third of the way to the Azores. While it is believed that airships can carry enough fuel to take them from New York to the Azores, it has never been done up to date except, I believe, in one instance.

The adoption of this amendment would put in jeopardy our entire southern air-mail route to Europe. I do not think we want to do that. This matter should be brought up before the Foreign Relations Committee. The amendment would repeal an order of the President issued under the Neutrality Act of 1939. Inasmuch as it virtually repeals another law, it seems to me it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the Senator in his long service in the House and in the Senate vote for a limitation upon appropriations?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Even though it might be a restriction of expenditure of public funds for some purpose otherwise authorized by law?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all this is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait one moment. I have voted for such restrictions. I served in the House when the father of the distinguished Senator from Missouri was Speaker of the House, and I recall distinctly that there never was a ruling while the Senator's father, Champ Clark, was Speaker, to the effect that you could repeal another law by a limitation placed on an appropriation bill. That is exactly what this proposal does.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me, I will say that that is perfectly good parliamentary law now. You cannot repeal an existing law, but you can withhold public funds from a purpose hitherto authorized by law, and I can cite the Senator 500 opinions in the House of Representatives during the time my father was Speaker and during the time of other distinguished Speakers to that very effect.

Mr. McKELLAR. The fact is that if this amendment is adopted, it will destroy that provision of the neutrality law under which the President acted. It will not only do that, Mr. President, but it may destroy the whole air-mail service to Europe. The Senator from Missouri said we were squandering $400,000. Mr. President, not only are we not squandering the $400,000 but, in my judgment, that expenditure will bring a return to the United States of every dollar that is spent or advanced to put this extra aircraft in commission at this time.

The mails are increasing enormously under war conditions. The increase of the air service in the manner proposed will help in every way. If the Senator wants our aircraft to begin at New York and go to the Azores, it will help immensely in the development of the air service. I hope it may be done. I do not want the airships to stop at Bermuda. I want these air clippers to be able to fly to the Azores. But if they cannot fly there, then with this amendment on the statute books there will be no air mail carried along the southern route.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. There are two points I want to bring out before we pass upon this item. To begin with I want to compliment the committee for the very modest increase in the appropriation. It was warranted by the facts and by the record. In looking at the record we find that in the first month of operations each flight carried 600 pounds of mail. That was in May of 1939. But in January of 1940 each flight carried 3,000 pounds of mail—more than enough to pay a profit on the operation. The revenues therefore now exceed the payment. It is the most remarkable growth of its kind in the history of the Postal Service. The Department paid the carriers $187,000 for the service in December, but the estimated postal revenue on that mail was $259,000.

I believe that record vindicates the action of the committee on this particular item.

The other point I wish to make is that the revenue will fall off materially if the British hold up and delay the mail at Bermuda.

A few short days ago I raised my voice in this Chamber in protest against British interference with the expeditious delivery of the mail. This mail is increasing by leaps and bounds because of the speed element involved in the delivery of the mail. The minute the mail is held up and robbed of its principal virtue, we are forced to subsidize the operation. Therefore I am in favor of some action on the part of the State Department or the Post Office Department to circumvent the action of the British Government, which, in my judgment, is unwarranted, unreasonable, and unnecessary.

I cannot quite agree with the amendment which has been offered, because I believe there is ample authority for the executive departments to act. For example, the ships can fly from the American coast line to the Azores without the necessity of stopping at Bermuda. They can fly on the route, which is known as F. A. M. 18, from New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, or Charleston, S. C. Under present-day climatic conditions much gas would be saved if the flight should originate at the southernmost city.

My second point is that in view of the wide variation allowed on this route, coupled with the demand for speed and quick delivery of the mail, I believe that the Department ought to change the starting point, at least temporarily, and obviate the necessity of a stop at Bermuda until we have better arrangements with the British authorities.

Mr. President, we read in the daily press what I forecast a short time ago, and that is the danger of the sinking of American ships, hailed on the high seas and involuntarily taken into British ports or other ports to which they are prohibited entry by our embargo law. If this policy continues I favor amendments even more severe than the amendment presented by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], but I believe there is ample authority in the departments to cover the situation, and that some action ought to be taken now. I again compliment the Senator in charge of the bill on his wise consideration of this item.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. When the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] read the text of the amendment, it reinforced the question asked me by the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]. That is, how is it to be carried out? There is a field for discretion. Until certain things are done, no part of the money shall be expended, and when those things are accomplished, when the British cease their censorship, we may again land at Bermuda. Who is to determine that question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the amendment is adopted, if no one else determines it, the Comptroller General of the United States can determine it. I should say in the first instance that the Post Office Department, after consultation with the State Department, would determine it. Under the existing law, if they do not arrive at a correct decision the Comptroller General of the United States has the duty imposed on him to determine the question.

Mr. HAYDEN. After all, under the text of his amendment, the Senator is imposing an authority on somebody to do certain things which is exactly what the State Department is now trying to accomplish, and the way to get away from the situation he points out is the same way the State Department is now pursuing, and that is not to go to Bermuda. I cannot see that we would shorten the trouble or avoid any difficulty by the enactment of this language.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is simply the difference between doing something and protesting. I have heard of protests from the State Department in the last war and in this war until I am sick of it. I should like to have the Congress of the United States say, "We are going to do something in this matter because we are tired of listening to protests which do not mean anything.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion to the Senator from Missouri. He is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. The matter he is talking about concerns our foreign relations. Why does he not bring this matter up before the Foreign Relations Committee and have the committee report on it to the Senate? Why undertake to jeopardize the whole air-mail system, which already has been a marvelous success across the Atlantic Ocean, in order to bolster up some view as to our foreign policy in the State Department?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me to answer his question, today I did just exactly what the Senator suggests. I introduced a bill to prevent American aircraft from touching at Bermuda so long as the proclamation of the President is in effect, and requested that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, which was done. But this is an essentially different question, Mr. President. This is a proposal for appropriating public funds for the purpose of enabling the British to continue in their course of action involving infringement of American rights, which our State Department asserts is illegal and unlawful. Therefore, in addition to being in favor of the bill which I introduced earlier today, and which has been referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which will doubtless be considered in due time by that committee, I am opposed to appropriating any further public funds to permit what our State Department says is an open and flagrant violation of our rights.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Surely the Senator from Missouri does not mean that the object of the amendment reported by the committee is to permit the British to do what he objects to?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say that the provision in the bill and the amendment of the committee increasing the appropriation is for the purpose of providing further funds for our ships, probably stopping at Bermuda, which will enable the British to carry on their illegal course of action. As the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] properly said, my amendment goes to the whole item. Its object is to prohibit the use of public funds for aircraft stopping at Bermuda so long as that illegal course of action is pursued.

Mr. BARKLEY. The object of the amendment is to provide service; and it is a mere incident that there might be some interference. That is not the object of the amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It may be a mere incident that one-half of one of the latest cargoes of mail was confiscated by the British at Bermuda.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have just one further word, and that is all I shall say. What do we find the situation to be? The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment which, in my view, would jeopardize the entire system of air mail between America and Europe, because we do not know whether we can fly to Bermuda. I hope we can, and I believe we can; but why jeopardize the whole system in order to effect a purpose which has been violently debated in the world for 100 years? I refer to the question of the right of search and seizure, a question on which our own Government heretofore has taken the opposite course.

Why jeopardize, by an amendment which is considered a limitation on the appropriation, the whole program of air mail between America and Europe, when the desired object can be accomplished in a direct way by the bill which the Senator has already introduced, and which is now before the Foreign Relations Committee, of which he is a member? He has introduced a bill. Why pass that bill in the form of an amendment to this appropriation measure, and thereby jeopardize the whole air-mail system to Europe, which up to date has been a wonderful success, and which in my judgment will pay. I ask the Senate to vote against the Senator's amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, at the time the Neutrality Act was under consideration by the Foreign Relations Committee evidence was introduced before the committee touching this very question of exempting Bermuda from the list of belligerent countries, or from the effect of the act on the belligerent countries so far as transportation was concerned. The evidence conclusively proved to the committee, or at least to me, that it was of great advantage to the United States for its airships to land at Bermuda, and that it would be very difficult to carry on a successful air transportation to Europe by the southern route without landing at Bermuda. The exemption of Bermuda was made in the interest of the United States, not in the interest of Great Britain or anyone else. As to whether or not there should be reprisals or retaliations against Great Britain, that is a question which should have very careful consideration before any action is taken. We know that reprisals and retaliations invite reprisals and retaliations, and very frequently lead to controversies which may result in war. I do not think any Member of this body has argued that viewpoint with any more strength than has my friend from Missouri, and he probably holds the same view now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly the Senator has never heard me assert any such proposition as that it might lead to war for the United States Congress to refuse to appropriate public funds for the purpose of our airships landing in Bermuda or any other particular foreign country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this item of $16,000,000 includes all the appropriations for air-mail service everywhere, including service across the Pacific Ocean, where we have had a successful line for a number of years, and service all around the South American Continent, which is absolutely necessary. If any of this money is used contrary to the proposed limitation, I do not know what will happen to all of it. I think we ought to let the matter alone.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] permit me to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] a question? This is the last time I shall interrupt the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the Senator from Tennessee contend that my amendment prohibiting American airships from stopping at Bermuda would interfere with the trans-Pacific flights of the Pan American Lines?

Mr. MCKELLAR. I will read the amendment——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have read the amendment. I wrote it. The Senator from Tennessee just advanced the proposition that my amendment putting a limitation on the expenditure of funds for planes which stop at Bermuda would interfere with the appropriation for trans-Pacific flights.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The amendment says:

That no part of the money appropriated under this item shall be expended for transportation of foreign mails by any aircraft landing on the island of Bermuda (except in the case of forced landings)—

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What has that to do with the Pacific?

Mr. MCKELLAR. The same company which runs the lines in the Pacific and in South America also runs this line—while a proclamation issued under authority of section 1 (a) of the Neutrality Act of 1939, and naming the United Kingdom, is in effect and while the Government of the United Kingdom asserts any alleged right to stop American aircraft and examine and confiscate mail.

I do not know what the amendment does, but it applies to the whole amount; and certainly if it does not jeopardize all the other services, it jeopardizes all the air-mail system across the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as I was saying, there is no doubt that the Senator from Missouri and other Senators realize the dangers of retaliations and reprisals. We all know what they lead to. As a matter of fact, in the World War, time after time, Great Britain and Germany each excused its own illegal acts on the ground of illegal acts of the other. I feel that when the time comes in the protection of our rights under international law or our rights under treaties, we may be justified in using retaliations and reprisals, particularly in the violation of a treaty, if the violation is admitted. Nevertheless, I realize the danger of hasty acts of that kind. I do not think any measure of retaliation should be enacted upon the floor of the United States Senate without any consideration by a committee, or any conference with the State Department, or any recommendations whatever. If this amendment has any effect whatever, it must be in the nature of retaliation against Great Britain for committing an illegal act in holding up our mails.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator is speaking of retaliation. I infer from the earlier part of the statement that this air-mail service is very greatly to the benefit of the United States; that it is our country which profits by the mail service. If we stop it, the retaliation will be upon ourselves. In other words, we are proposing to deny ourselves the benefit of the air-mail service because we dislike something which Great Britain does in the course of its war policies; so we shall be the sufferers from the reprisal.

Mr. PITTMAN. I still think the intent of the proposed action is retaliation. The effect of it, of course, would be exactly as the Senator from Colorado has said: We would cut off our nose to spite our face.

The time may come, it may be nearly here, it may be here now, when the rights and dignity of the Government of the United States justify us in taking positive steps to stop illegal discriminations against our commerce and our mails. I think there is a far more serious subject than the stoppage of our mail at Bermuda. I think the threat of the German Government to sink our American vessels which have been forcibly taken into British ports upon the departure of those vessels from those ports presents a far graver question than is presented simply by the illegal interference with our mails at Bermuda. I do not know any international law which permits a belligerent to go upon the high seas and take a neutral vessel into its port for the purpose of determining whether or not it has contraband on board.

I know belligerents have a right to stop a neutral vessel on the high seas, examine its cargo and its destination, and determine for themselves whether or not the cargo is contraband; but if they determine that it is not contraband, the ship moves on in its course.

The same question arose during the World War. At that time Great Britain took our neutral ships, with neutral cargoes, into British ports and kept them there for weeks. Sometimes, I believe, she confiscated the cargoes and paid for them. Admittedly, that was against international law at that time, and it is against international law at this time.

I do not think Germany has a legal right to sink American vessels departing from British ports in such circumstances. Germany knows at this time that under our law our vessels cannot be, and are not, armed. She knows that they will stop and submit to search and seizure. Therefore, to submarine an American vessel leaving a British port would be not only an illegal but a brutal act; and the worst of it is that the repeated taking of the lives of American citizens under those conditions would excite this country. It might excite it to the point where the country would go to extremes. I do not believe it would, nor do I believe Congress would ever declare war by reason of such acts. Nevertheless, it would be justified in doing so under the theories of the past.

We now have American ships on the high seas, moving around the world. Their destinations are known to the whole world. Their cargoes can be ascertained by the British Ambassador here before the ships sail. Not a pound of that freight is moving to any belligerent. Not a pound of that freight is going into any part of the combat area established by the President under the Neutrality Act. The only excuse Great Britain could have for claiming that there is a pound of contraband in any of those cargoes is under the theory of continuous voyage and ultimate destination, that some of these goods are going into Italy, and ultimately will be transported into Germany.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. Just for a question. I am now presenting a situation, and I prefer to have the Senator wait until I conclude.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The Senator has just stated that our ships are now traveling in neutral zones; and we know that none of them have been sunk. If they continue to travel in neutral zones, and, against the will of their captains, are taken into the war zone by British ships, and any of those American ships, having been taken out of the neutral zone against the will of their captains, as a result thereof are sunk by German submarines, who will be to blame?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am now discussing that question.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I ask the Senator, Who will be to blame?

Mr. PITTMAN. I prefer to answer the question in my own way, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to do so. It is very hard to answer by "yes" or "no" questions of such grave purport, involving so many different degrees of guilt or lack of guilt.

I say, however, that the only excuse the British Government could have for examining the cargo of any of these ships going through the Mediterranean is under the theory of continuous voyage, which theory was established by the Supreme Court of the United States. At that time, apparently, goods coming to the British possessions off the coast of Florida had nowhere to go except to the Confederate Government. All true; but in this case it is absurd, or, if not absurd, it is arbitrary, for the British Government to say that American vessels which are prohibited from going into any zone around Great Britain or Germany, limited in their course, limited in their transactions to neutrals and to neutrals outside of contraband zones, can be carrying goods to a belligerent under the far-fetched theory of continuous voyage.

The British Ambassador can go to the State Department and find out every ship that is going to sail, and every kind of cargo on it, and the destination of all of it. We must take notice of actual facts in the world. We know that there is not a country on the Mediterranean today which would voluntarily ship any goods into Germany. It is said that goods going to Italy may go into Germany. Of course, that is true; yet general knowledge of the conditions in Italy today, of the sentiment of the people of Italy, of the disposition of Mussolini, contradict any desire upon the part of Italy to furnish munitions of war at this time to Germany. But suppose part of a few cargoes on a few American ships that stop in Italy should leak across the mountains into Germany: Would that justify this illegal taking of our ships into ports into the war zone and the threatening of their destruction through retaliation by Germany?

If the United States were an antagonistic nation, if it were sympathetic with the enemies of Great Britain, if it would be natural for us by subterfuge to try to get something into Germany in some way, somehow, then the British Government's attitude might find some justification and some excuse. In the past it may have been only a commercial interference. It may have affected the profits of a trip to have one vessel held up in a British port for 15 days while its competitor was held up for only 3 days; but matters have now gone beyond that point. We are now facing the direct issue that our merchant vessels will be taken into a port of Great Britain, at Gibraltar, and there searched for what the British call contraband, which in the very nature of things cannot be such; and that alleged contraband taken into British ports the British Government itself determines to be contraband on some far-fetched theory of international law with regard to contraband. Germany has announced that she is going to retaliate for that action. If our ships which are dragged against our protest into those British harbors, when they leave on their voyage, unarmed, attempting to carry out our Neutrality Act, sacrificing our shipping to a great extent to do it, without arms, openly disarmed, are sunk in the night in the Mediterranean by a submarine without notice—if and when that happens, it is going to arouse an intense feeling in this country; and if it is repeated, that feeling will grow worse. Those are the things which will cause the Congress, as well as the administration, to think of what steps must be taken to remove that danger and that threat.

I should not be prepared here to propose any particular method. I should not be prepared here to vote for any particular method. I should not be prepared even to offer anything until I had obtained all the facts at the present time from the State Department. We may have to do it sometime; but, in view of the seriousness of retaliation, of reprisals, in view of the fact that if this is a reprisal upon Great Britain we shall be injured a hundred times more than Great Britain will be injured, it loses its effect as a reprisal. We should not attempt to deal with such an important matter by legislating on an appropriation bill. Even though it be legal legislation by limitation, still if it is legislation there is only a technical parliamentary distinction; and we should not attempt in that way to deal with such a vital question as this question is today.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words before the vote is taken.

I think we have arrived at a time in this country when we should realize that we are confronted with more danger than ever before since war was declared on September 3. I am interested only in keeping the United States out of this war. I know that 99 percent of the American people want to stay out of this war, despite the fact that I believe 90 percent of our people are 100 percent in favor of the Allies.

It is not my understanding that the senior Senator from Missouri is trying to destroy our air-mail system. To judge from what has been said here, one reading the RECORD would unquestionably get the impression that he was attempting to destroy that system.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The only purpose and intent of the amendment, and the only purpose that can possibly be accomplished by it, is to stop the expenditure of public funds for assisting American aircraft which are to stop at Bermuda, so long as a position which our State Department has asserted and feels is unlawful, is maintained by Great Britain.

Mr. REYNOLDS. In addition to that, it is my understanding that the Senator from Missouri is interested in protecting American interests by way of speeding the American air mail.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I do not think we should be criticized for attempting to look after our own interests. I think it is time a number of the American people became pro-American. It is not denied that America is pro-British to a large extent, but I think the time has arrived when some of us should become pro-American. I am interested in protecting the interests of the people of the United States, and I do not see why there should be any criticism directed toward any Member of this body or any Member of the House of Representatives when he rises in the interests of the United States Government, whom we are supposed to represent.

Great Britain has stopped our ships at Bermuda, she has insisted upon examining the mail—every bit of it—reading the letters and opening up the packages, because otherwise she would not know whether it was contraband or not. It will be all the better if we can send a plane from this country to Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, with one stop, as suggested by the able junior Senator from New York [Mr. MEAD], who I dare say is as familiar as any other man in this body, and, as suggested by him, the probabilities are that we would save money.

It is said that there is someone in authority in this Government who has a right to designate the route, and say where these ships should fly from and where they should stop, and it has been suggested that such an order will be issued. But why depend upon a mere suggestion, a presumption that that will be done, when the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri will assure that it will be done? Why take a chance on something being done when we may know it will be done?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In the event the Civil Aeronautics Authority, or the Pan American Air Lines, or anybody else in authority, decided to fly planes from Puerto Rico to the Azores, or from Charleston, S. C., to the Azores, or from Wilmington, N. C., to the Azores, as is entirely practicable, then this amendment would have no force and effect whatever. This would not interfere with the air-mail appropriation, because the planes would not stop at Bermuda, and the British would not have a chance to search the mail and confiscate part of it. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the British not only claim but exercise the right to search mail coming to the United States from Europe as well as that going from the United States to Europe. The question as to its being contraband does not enter into it at all.

Mr. REYNOLDS. The word "retaliation" was employed here a moment ago. One of our colleagues—I have forgotten who it was—suggested that Great Britain might consider this an act of retaliation. Let us see about that.

We lifted the arms embargo for the purpose of assisting Great Britain, and, speaking of retaliation, Great Britain retaliated by putting an embargo on our tobacco and our cotton and stopping our ships and searching them and reading our mail.

I do not see how anyone could consider our act an act of retaliation if all we are endeavoring to do is to speed up our mail and to save money and to provide better mail accommodations for the American people. Have we arrived at a point where we cannot rise in this Chamber and speak for the rights of our own Government? I know we have not.

I say that we are facing a very serious hour, and for the first time in this country the American people themselves recognize that we are facing a serious hour. They recognized it when Germany issued the statement to the effect that she felt she would have a right under international law to sink our ships if they were found out of the neutral zones and in the port of a belligerent.

I am not an authority upon international law, but I have made inquiry of Members of this body whom I do consider authorities, and they were not positive as to whether or not such an action on the part of Germany would be a violation of international law. But the point to which I am about to come I wish to illustrate in this manner: A is in this Chamber; he is in no danger whatsoever. On the outside of this barricaded Chamber there are murderers, and A knows that if he leaves the safety of this Chamber and goes outside of the Chamber he will be murdered. A, being a cautious man, is not desirous of being murdered; but B, who likewise is in this Chamber, bodily takes A on the outside of this Chamber and, as a result of the act of B, A is murdered by parties whom we will designate as C. Who is to blame? B and C are jointly to blame, because B had no right to take A out of the safety zone into the danger zone against his will.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator would exonerate the murderers?

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; I would not exonerate the murderers, not at all, but I would hold B and C equally guilty. Our ships are traveling in neutral zones. We have done everything in the world we could to keep out of the war. We have done all we could, according to the dictates of our consciences, to keep America neutral, and keep it from being engaged in the squabble in Europe. We have wiped our ships from the seas.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LEE. Does the Senator's illustration mean that A stands for America and B for Britain?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Not at all. I am merely using that as a simple illustration. Our ships are traveling from American shores in neutral zones. They have never traveled outside of those neutral zones, those safety zones, and they are not going to. But Great Britain comes along and seizes our ships, she takes them out of the safety zones, and takes them into belligerent ports.

Germany notified this Government yesterday that hereafter if any of our ships were found outside of those neutral zones she felt that under international law she would have the right to sink those American ships. Our ships are going to continue to travel in those neutral zones. But suppose Great Britain seizes them at sea, as she has done heretofore, and takes them out of the safety zones into belligerent ports, against the will of the commanders of the ships, and while outside of a safety zone a ship is torpedoed and sunk. Who is to blame? Is England to blame or is Germany to blame? That is a question this body is going to be called upon to answer.

If England will stop her unwarranted seizure of our ships—and I use the word "unwarranted" for the reason that it was used a moment ago, according to my recollection, by the able chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, when he stated that they could find out what constituted the cargo of a ship which left our shores——

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. If we are to judge by the temper of the people of the times in which Andrew Jackson lived, and the positive Americanism he exhibited at that time, would he not, when Britain seized our ships, seize Bermuda? I ask able Senators to read the state papers of Jackson, a great American. His patriotism was not diluted by propaganda and internationalism. He was an American, nothing but an American, and wholly an American. He was not pro this and pro that, and he left us a rich heritage of patriotism, a country free of debt, and not a shot was fired in any French-American war; yet when the French Empire refused to pay us their just debt, Jackson threatened to seize their American territory.

Yes; the French paid, and paid in full, and there was no war; yet we were small and weak and they were great and strong; but they were 3,000 miles away across a great ocean, and we had a mighty man in the White House, whose word was respected in the councils of the nations of all the world.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not think Andrew Jackson would have put up with what we are bearing with now in many instances.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. While the Senator has been very modest in his disclaimer of being an expert on international law, I look upon him as very much of an expert.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I do not claim to know a thing about international law.

Mr. ADAMS. We recognize the Senator as being well versed in it. The Senator's argument is premised on the fact that Germany would have a right to sink an American ship if it went into a belligerent port. As a matter of fact, the Senator will agree that Germany has no right to sink an American ship engaged in ordinary commercial traffic, even though it goes into a British port, unless it is carrying contraband or is seeking to run a blockade.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I quite understand that. I did not say that Germany had that right. Up to date not one of our ships has been attacked, not one of our ships has been sunk; therefore, if we are to judge the future by the history and experience of the past, we may continue upon the assumption that, so long as our ships remain within the confines of the neutral zones, they will not be sunk.

Mr. ADAMS. The Senator knows that this country went to war in order to protect the right of American ships engaged in peaceable commerce to go into the war zone during the World War.

Mr. REYNOLDS. After this country had been flooded with propaganda; and I think that propaganda spread in this country by the British was more largely responsible for our entering the war than was the sinking of any ship. The sinking of the Lusitania was merely the climax of the whole thing.

Mr. ADAMS. A British ship.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. ADAMS. Does the Senator think that under any condition a passenger ship or a freight ship can lawfully be sunk by a submarine?

Mr. REYNOLDS. Does the Senator mean an American ship?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is a question of international law, and I just told the Senator that I did not hold out the slightest claim of being one well versed in international law. I am merely saying that up to this hour—that is, since September 3—our ships have been traveling exclusively in neutral zones, and not one of those ships has been sunk or attacked by German submarines. I say that if we can judge the future by the past, so long as our ships stay in neutral zones, they will not be attacked, they will not be sunk. The question I bring to the attention of the Senate is this: Suppose that one of our ships travels in a neutral zone. Suppose Great Britain takes that ship out of the neutral zone into belligerent waters and she is sunk by a German submarine, what is going to happen? You know what is going to happen, and I know what is going to happen. The American people will become so thoroughly inflamed that they will demand actual physical retaliation, and they will want to go to war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MINTON in the chair). Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I gladly yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. If it be true, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS] has so forcefully suggested, that an American ship cannot legally be sunk if it goes voluntarily into a belligerent zone or combat zone, what additional right is given to the other belligerent if that ship is involuntarily taken into the combat zone and, when it is released, seeks to go back into the neutral zone? What additional right would be given to Germany or any other nation to sink that ship because it happened to be found in a combat zone, where it had been taken involuntarily and while it is trying to get out and back into a neutral zone? And would the Senator hold equally guilty of the murder of American citizens the nation which had taken it into the combat zone with the nation that sank it while in the combat zone?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I cannot make an argument on an assumption of that sort. I am simply bringing a question to the attention of the Members of the Senate, and asking what would happen if one of our ships while traveling in a neutral zone were forcibly and against its will taken out of that zone and placed in belligerent waters or a port, and then sunk by the Germans. Whether such action is legal or illegal, the American people will demand retaliation. The American people will become aroused, because up to date we have had almost the same amount of propaganda in this country that we experienced prior to our entrance into the last war. For that reason I am highly interested in a resolution which I understand has been introduced by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] designed to look into the matter of propaganda which is being spread in this country by paid lecturers from abroad and by socialite aliens who are honeycombing this country to the detriment of the American people.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. LUNDEEN. We are looking into propaganda in this country, Mr. President, but we are not looking into British propaganda in this country, and that is the most dangerous of all propaganda, because it aims to bring us into war.

The British now seize our ships and take them into the war zone, thinking thereby they can put America into the war. And I ask distinguished and able Democrats sitting before me here to read the story of Andrew Jackson before they smile at any deductions we may make from his philosophy.

Bermuda is an American island. It holds a key position on our Atlantic coast. From its shores bombers can attack our great cities and industrial plants. Here we have the British monopolizing Bermuda, siphoning in our wealth from the United States of America, and now insolently opening our mails while our door-mat State Department makes a few weak gestures. The British know that no serious protest will be made.

We made the same weak gestures during the World War, and we are repeating the same procedure now. However, if Germany or Italy or Japan or the U. S. S. R. dare to assert their rights as they see them, our diplomats rage in frantic fury. Why not take a positive stand? Why not assert our American rights when the British are involved? I repeat, if we had an Andrew Jackson in the White House today when the English seize our ships and wrongfully take them into the war zones, where the Germans may sink them, a Jacksonian President, judging by his state papers while President, would seize Bermuda and hold it until the British came to their senses and made some real effort to respect American rights.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, we are facing a dangerous situation. Of course, it is dangerous for any man in public life to open his mouth or to utter one word in behalf of his country if of necessity in that argument he must mention Great Britain, because it is said that those who openly oppose our entrance into this war are pro-Nazi. So far as I am concerned, I do not care what they say or write about me, so long as I have the right in this body or in any other public forum to speak out in the interest of the American people, and I say it is high time that the American people became pro-American. It is high time that we begin looking after our interests, the interests of the United States, instead of pussyfooting around and being afraid to say anything that might be construed to be against Great Britain.

Mr. President, I am not against Great Britain. I am not against anybody. I am only pro-United States of America.

Getting back to the Senator's amendment, I do not see how the adoption of his amendment will destroy our air-mail system. I dare say without hesitation that there is no one in this body who is more thoroughly enthusiastic in the support of our air-mail system than I am. I know that the development of the Pan-American Air Lines in all of the more than 20-odd republics and dictatorships to the south of us has done more to help our businessmen, our industrialists, than anything else has done. I know that the businessmen of this country have been helped by the extension of our lines to the Hawaiian Islands and across to Guam and Manila in the Far East, and, prior to the war, to Hong Kong, and also to Canton, 100 miles up the river.

I was happy to learn several days ago that the Pan American Lines intends to extend a branch from Honolulu to New Zealand, to connect there with the British lines extending to Perth, Melbourne, and Sidney, and north to Darwin and south to Tasmania. I think that is marvelous.

I have been very enthusiastic about the speeding up of the carrying of mail from American shores to Europe. But if we appropriate money here, let us make the best utilization of that money for the American people. If, as has been said, an Executive order is all that is necessary to route those ships away from Bermuda, fine and dandy; but now, when we have an opportunity to say we shall not subject ourselves to embarrassment—we shall not permit those whom we are intending to favor to make examination of our mails and to destroy our ships—why not do it here by way of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. President, it may be the British are retaliating against us for favoring them in stopping at Bermuda. Let us see about another piece of retaliation. Ninety-five percent of the revenue derived by the Government of Bermuda, whose capital is Hamilton, comes out of the port of New York. I dare say that 90 percent of all the tourists that go to Bermuda come from the United States of America. We provide the funds for the running of the government there. The United States provides 95 percent of all the revenues that the British there have with which to conduct their government.

We favor them further by providing them with the convenience of an airline from New York to Bermuda and from Bermuda to Europe, and after having provided them with that favor perhaps they are attempting to retaliate by holding up our airships and examining our mail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] on page 49, line 17.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment; and, pending that, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to the committee amendment on page 49.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri, Mr. JOHNSON of California, and other Senators demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McNARY (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. STEWART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who is absent. I am not advised how he would vote. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SLATTERY] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Utah (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] and vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MINTON. So the amendment of Mr. CLARK of Missouri to the committee amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 49, line 16.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate by asking for the yeas and nays on the committee amendment. I merely desire to make it a matter of record that I cast my vote against this unjustifiable extravagance in the committee amendment increasing the appropriation over that allowed by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 49, line 16.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Second Assistant Postmaster General", on page 49, line 21, after the word "offices", to strike out "$11,100,000" and insert "$11,150,000", so as to read:

Star route service: For inland transportation by star routes (excepting service in Alaska), including temporary service to newly established offices, $11,150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, line 2, after the word "letters", to strike out "$1,270,000" and insert "$1,325,500", so as to read:

Powerboat service: For inland transportation by steamboat or other powerboat routes, including ship, steamboat, and way letters, $1,325,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 51, line 25, after the word "to", to strike out "the Fifth Congress of the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, $7,500, to remain available until June 30, 1942, this sum to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster General and accounted for on his certificate notwithstanding the provisions of any other law", and insert: "(a) A meeting of a Technical Committee for Transit of the Universal Postal Union, $5,000, to be immediately available; (b) a special Congress of the Universal Postal Union, $10,000; (c) the Fifth Congress of the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, $7,500, to remain available until June 30, 1942; these sums to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster General and accounted for on his certificate notwithstanding the provisions of any other law", so as to read:

Foreign mail transportation: For transportation of foreign mails, except by aircraft, $2,670,000: Provided, That the Postmaster General is authorized to expend such sums as may be necessary, not to exceed $70,000, to cover the cost to the United States for maintaining sea post service on ocean steamships conveying the mails to and from the United States: Provided further, That of this sum there may be available for expenses of delegates designated from the Post Office Department by the Postmaster General to (a) a meeting of a Technical Committee for Transit of the Universal Postal Union, $5,000, to be immediately available; (b) a special Congress of the Universal Postal Union, $10,000; (c) the Fifth Congress of the Postal Union of the Americas and Spain, $7,500, to remain available until June 30, 1942; these sums to be expended in the discretion of the Postmaster General and accounted for on his certificate notwithstanding the provisions of any other law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Office of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General," on page 56, line 25, after the word "offices", to strike out "$9,950,000" and insert "$10,000,000", so as to read:

Rent, light, fuel, and water: For rent, light, fuel, and water, for first-, second-, and third-class post offices, and the cost of advertising for lease proposals for such offices, $10,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment.

If there be no further amendment, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, before we conclude the Senate action on this bill, while I am in agreement with the Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. McKELLAR] and the subcommittee which reported the bill, I wish to point out what I deem to be a very important matter of public policy which affects the appropriation for the Railway Mail Service. I refer to the item on page 50. It has to do with what I believe is the most effective and the most excellent domestic service that we have within the Post Office Department.

In 1939 the appropriation for the Railway Mail Service was $57,500,000. In 1940 it was reduced to $56,000,000. In 1941 the Post Office Department recommended to the Budget Bureau an appropriation of $56,748,000. The Budget Bureau reduced that amount, and recommended in its report $56,283,000. The deficit for the current year amounts to $326,000. If that were taken into consideration together with the recommendations made by the Post Office Department, and if, in addition to that, consideration were given to the constant and steady upturn in postal volume, the appropriation for 1941 would at least equal the appropriation for 1939.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MEAD. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. We invited the heads of the several branches of the Post Office Department to appear before the committee to make any suggestions they had about appropriations. They were entirely satisfied with this appropriation, and offered no evidence concerning it. We thought they probably knew how much they wanted, and we accepted their statement about it.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. President, as I said at the outset, I am finding no particular fault with the subcommittee. I really believe that in the consideration of the bill, taken as a whole, the subcommittee has been extremely fair and most considerate.

However, I wish to point out for the future guidance of the subcommittee—and not at all for an increased appropriation—the fact that we are impoverishing a service which, by reason of its speed and excellence, increases and attracts added volume, which means added revenue to the Postal Service taken as a whole.

When we reduce this particular item, and postal volume continues to increase, it must be collected, sorted, and distributed. But if this key Service—excellent, speedy Railway Mail Service—is without funds, then the mail must be handled in the next best manner. So we find in the Post Office appropriation bills a developing increase in other items and a corresponding decrease in this item, which means not exactly economy, but a slowing-up of the delivery of the mail.

To indicate that I have some substantial ground upon which to base my argument, I find in the report on this particular item by the committee on the other side of the Capitol this information:

> If it should be necessary to increase the permanent forces, the committee understands and expects that the Department will care for the volume of the mail, and if it becomes necessary to go on a deficiency basis, the Congress will provide the additional sum which absolute necessity indicates will have to be granted. This is not a new procedure in the handling of postal affairs—> and is deemed a wiser course than in appropriating fully for a maximum anticipated volume of business 18 months in advance of the time when the period, in which that volume of business would arise, will expire.

So indicates the committee—

One would take it from that statement that the committee anticipates a deficiency. There is, in reality, a deficiency now. One would also assume from that statement that it would be perfectly all right—in fact, in order—for the Department to operate the Service on a deficiency basis; but let me read what another committee has to say. This is what the law has to say.

About the time this report was made, about the time this hearing was held, about the time the Department was advised to come in and ask for a deficiency appropriation, the chairman of the House Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments brought to the attention of the body section 169 of the general law—section 665, title 31, United States Code—wherein is found this statement:

> No executive department or other Government establishment of the United States shall expend, in any one fiscal year, any sum in excess of the appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year, or involve the Government in any contract or other obligation for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations unless such contract or obligation is authorized by law. Nor shall any department or any officer of the Government accept voluntary service for the Government or employ personal service in excess of that authorized by law, except in cases of sudden emergency involving the loss of human life or the destruction of property.

And so forth. In the report of the House committee we find an open invitation to come in and ask for a deficiency appropriation. In the operation of this particular service we find that a deficiency actually exists. In the other items contained in the appropriation we find wholesome, healthy increases in appropriations in direct proportion to the increased volume of mail, but in this item we find a reduction of the amount asked for by the department. In these two conflicting statements we find an invitation to come in and get the deficiency appropriation, and a warning that "you will be violating the law, and held to a strict accountability, if you do."

So I hope that in the consideration of all items for the collection, transportation, and distribution of the mail, whether it be by star route, rural route, Railway Mail Service, or any other service, prudent consideration will be given to the appropriation of a sufficient amount of money, not for the collection and distribution of the mail by any medium but for the collection and distribution and transportation of the mail in accordance with the traditions of the Postal Service; that is, the best, the speediest, and the most attractive manner.

I merely desire to make this point, and then I am through: The Railway Mail Service is being impoverished. Other services are receiving wholesome increases. In the name of the Railway Mail Service, I ask the committee to go completely into the record, to consider this item from every reasonable approach, and to see to it that they secure the appropriation for the deficiency which in reality they have been invited to apply for.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. What is the issue now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I call for that question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss the question of our gold and silver policy in connection with the passage of this bill. Shortly after 12 o'clock I made a promise that I would not make my remarks until just before the passage of the bill. At that time I had no idea that we should have 4 hours of discussion; but before the vote is finally taken I desire to use a few minutes of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the question which has been raised on the other side of the aisle; that is, criticisms of our gold and silver policies.

Mr. President, the vote about to be cast is on the bill proposing to make appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941.

This bill provides the money to run the Treasury Department, and the Treasury Department provides the money to run the Government. In addition to financing the Government, the Treasury Department shapes, if not controls, the financial policies of not only the United States but the world.

The question of money is the most important question that can confront any nation. Now, after thousands of years of civilization's development, we find the world without a recognized monetary system, with each nation, including the United States, operating on a 24-hour basis.

Under our Constitution, the Congress is the policy-making branch of our Government.

Under the Constitution, the Congress has original and exclusive jurisdiction and power to provide and maintain a monetary system for our country. Since records have been kept, gold and silver have been by all peoples recognized and used as money. Yet today we have pending in the Congress bills proposing to discredit and discontinue the use of silver as money; and we have Senators and Representatives, in and out of this Capitol, making speeches and writing articles seeking to discredit, if not discontinue, the use of gold as the common money of account not only of our country but of the world.

During recent months some distinguished and able Senators, economists, bankers, and publicists have tried to disarrange, if not disrupt, what little stability relating to money we still have left in the world.

May I remind these gentlemen, upon whose shoulders rests very great responsibility, that at this hour our monetary system is the one and only beacon light for all the nations of the earth. To destroy this light and to disrupt our policy will bring immediate economic chaos to each and every nation dealing in international commerce and trade.

Should we discredit gold by refusing to accept the metal as money, the world would be forced to go on a 100-percent barter basis.

On this occasion the time I shall use will be on only one phase of our financial policy—our policy relating to gold.

As briefly as possible I shall try to state and analyze the problem; and later I hope to be able to suggest possible solutions and remedies.

Mr. President, before discussing our so-called gold policy, I shall refer briefly to some of the criticisms in an effort to learn, if possible, of the alleged objections to such policy.

On January 29 the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], in addressing a press association, is reported to have referred to our gold policy as "a one-way street."

Again on February 1, in addressing the Senate, the Senator made the following statement:

> I assure the Senate that the present gold and silver policy cannot endure.

On February 9 the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] referred to our policy as "a mistaken, fallacious gold policy."

On February 8 the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], in connection with his request to insert some data in the RECORD, said:

> We are buying all this Russian gold, which, I understand, costs not more than $11 an ounce to mine, at $35 per ounce. It is all part of our general gold folly.

Again on February 10, in delivering a Lincoln Day address at St. Paul, the distinguished Senator is reported to have made an attack upon our gold and silver policy.

In a copyrighted article under the heading "Vandenberg lays platform for Presidency," we find the following sentences:

> Stop buying all the gold and silver of the world at swollen prices, when we already have twice as much as we can use. Yes; stop buying gold from Russia at $35 an ounce which Russia produces for $11 an ounce and puts the profit into the execrable war upon Scandinavia.

Mark Sullivan, a well-known writer, calls our gold policy "a golden elephant."

The American Banker prints an editorial under the caption, "Our Gold—An Unsolved Problem."

Roger W. Babson, an economist, says that "we have 70 percent of the world's gold. That is too much."

R. C. Leffingwell, a Morgan partner, says:

> We are buying gold we don't want and can't use.

Winthrop W. Aldrich, chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank, a $3,000,000,000 institution, in his report to his stockholders, says:

> This influx of gold into the United States is far from an unmixed blessing.

E. A. Goldenweiser, economist for the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, admits that we have a gold problem today.

The Washington Post in a recent editorial refers to our gold policy as outrageously irresponsible.

Mr. President, what is this "one-way street," this "mistaken, fallacious gold policy," this "gold folly," this "golden elephant," this "far from unmixed blessing," and this "outrageously irresponsible" something that seems to be haunting the Washington Post?

What is the objection, or what are the objections, raised to date by the critics of our gold policy and program?

An examination of the speeches made and articles published to date reveals three charges or indictments, as follows:

The first objection or indictment seems to be leveled at our policy of accepting Russian gold in payment for American goods, wares, services, and commodities, or for settling trade balances due institutions and interests in the United States.

The second count or indictment seems to be leveled against the law which fixes the value of gold at $35 per fine ounce; and

The third complaint seems to be that we are acquiring too much of the golden metal.

Before undertaking any explanation of our so-called gold program let me quote from some of our critics as to the effect of the policy we have adopted and are now pursuing.

The senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND], while condemning our policy in his address before referred to, states:

> When foreign bullion comes here and the foreign sellers get dollars for it, those dollars may be used in three ways: To build up foreign bank deposits here; to be invested in securities or factories here, or to buy American goods, pay for American services, and the like. In fact, the billions of dollars of proceeds of the foreign metal sent here in recent years have been used in all three ways.
> It is true that the use of such foreign-owned dollars to buy our motortrucks, our cotton, or our airplanes makes jobs for Americans. It makes export business.

The Washington Post, while condemning our program, admits that gold shipped from Russia "enables the Soviet Government to build up dollar balances here" and that "these dollars can be used to buy copper, machinery, and various goods that Russia needs."

While the critics of our gold policy condemn our acceptance of gold in payment for American products, yet those who have made a study of the problem admit that when gold comes here it is used to pay for our surplus products, such as manufactured articles, services, and commodities.

My senatorial colleagues condemn the policy of accepting gold, the only real money in the world, as payment for our products. But none of these critics have heretofore, to my knowledge, pointed out in detail the alleged defects of the system, nor have they proposed either a change or a modification of our so-called gold policy.

The eminent writer Mark Sullivan, while he ridicules and trys to make fun out of our gold policy, religiously refrains from hazarding a suggestion either for a change or a remedy. The nearest thing to a solution is his statement that we might give the gold "to our wives to wear as earrings and bracelets—mementos of a New Deal experiment."

The American Banker, presuming to speak for and to keep the bankers advised as to financial matters, although apparently condemning our policy, has neither amendment, change, nor solution to offer.

Roger W. Babson, while joining the anvil chorus in condemning the existence of so much gold in our Treasury, likewise fails to suggest a remedy.

At this point let me refer briefly to our so-called "silver policy." Relative to this policy we have no problem.

Under the act approved June 19, 1934, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to acquire silver, but the rapidity with which he receives the white metal is left to the discretion of that official.

The act passed at the recent session refers only to silver mined in the United States and our possessions, and hence is subject to change at the will of the Congress.

All of our money is based on some kind of value. Our Federal Reserve notes, now in circulation to the amount of over $5,000,000,000, are based upon 40 percent of gold and 60 percent of commercial paper, such as notes, bonds, and other evidences of indebtedness.

Our United States notes, now in circulation to the amount of $346,000,000, are based upon gold bullion on deposit in the Treasury.

Our silver certificates, now in circulation to the amount of over $1,700,000,000, are based upon silver bullion on deposit in the Treasury.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator just stated that the silver certificates are based upon bullion on deposit, but is it not a fact that the provision of the act which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain parity between all kinds of currency is equivalent to basing the silver certificates on gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It is true, Mr. President, that under the Gold Standard Act passed in 1900, and later amended by the provision which was a part of the agricultural-adjustment measure which passed in 1933, the Secretary of the Treasury is under a mandate to keep all of our money on a parity with gold, not only the money at home but that abroad.

Mr. CONNALLY. One other question, and then I will not disturb the Senator further. I am in sympathy, of course, with those producing silver who want to get money for their silver, just as I am in sympathy with a similar desire on the part of the man who has a bale of hay, or any other article of commerce; but, so far as money is concerned, I cannot see that it makes any difference whether we are buying the silver or doing anything about silver, because, after all, our money is based on gold, theoretically on a certain number of ounces of gold. I admit that when it comes to discussing the intricacies of the money question I am a mere tyro. I do not want to know anything about money except how to enjoy what little I can get of it, but I do not see anything to this theory of buying a lot of silver and sticking it away in the ground, because it is not money after we get it—it is just so much metal; that is all it is.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I have heretofore favored a wider use of silver. I took that position on the theory that by the use of silver we could expand the permanent money of the United States. At this time we have but little permanent money in circulation in the United States. The only permanent money we have in circulation is, first, silver certificates, which, of course, covers silver dollars; and second, greenbacks, or so-called United States notes. Those are the only two classes of permanent money there are in circulation at the present time. There are, it is true, five billion of Federal Reserve notes, but those notes are temporary dollars, and can be expanded or withdrawn from circulation almost at the will of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System.

Mr. President, since the silver question has been mentioned, I might state for the RECORD that at present there are almost 3,000,000 ounces of silver in the Treasury. At 50 cents an ounce only, that would make a value in silver of one and a half billion dollars. The Secretary of the Treasury can issue currency against our silver on the basis of $1.29 an ounce. So, under the law, the Secretary could issue over $3,000,000,000 of silver certificates, when the fact is, he is issuing today only about $1,700,000,000. Therefore at this time there is silver bullion in the Treasury to the full value, as measured in gold, for every dollar of silver certificates in circulation. So I contend that today the silver certificates are the only class of money we have which can be redeemed in something of value.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why should it not be our national policy that when we buy a dollar's worth of gold from abroad we issue a gold certificate for a dollar against it, instead of selling bonds and paying the interest on the bonds with which to buy the gold, and then burying it? If we have the gold, if it is in our vaults, why should we not simply issue against that a certificate, and use that certificate with which to buy the gold, and not pay out interest, and at the same time have a larger volume of money, every dollar of which is backed by a hundred cents of gold, or even more than that, at the present time 200 cents?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I shall deal with that question a little bit later, but let me make one statement now. We now have in our Treasury approximately $18,100,000,000 in gold. If we should coin that gold into dollars, or if we should issue gold certificates against that gold, and put those certificates into circulation, we would thereby increase the circulation of gold to $18,100,000,000. The reason why that is not done is that if it should be done money would become so plentiful that money itself would not be very valuable, although the money was gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Commenting upon the suggestion just made by the Senator from Oklahoma in reply to the Senator from Texas, I believe it is correct to state that the largest amount of money ever in circulation in this country at any one time was a little over $7,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. We now have in circulation $7,400,000,000, or approximately that amount.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is about the maximum that has ever been in circulation in this country at any one time. So that if we did use the gold which is now the property of the Government of the United States—and I may say that all the $18,000,000,000 is not owned by the Government of the United States; some of it is earmarked for Federal Reserve banks——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Only a little more than $1,000,000,000 is earmarked for the account of foreign governments.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think I am correct in stating that $2,000,000,000, practically, is earmarked for Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Federal Reserve banks have gold certificates, a claim on $12,000,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. They have gold certificates, but those gold certificates are not certificates which can be passed in ordinary use as money. They are only gold certificates given to the Federal Reserve banks as evidence of their ownership of this gold, and they are not in circulation. So that, if we were to use all the gold that is referred to rather facetiously sometimes as being "buried" in Kentucky at Fort Knox because that is a safe place in which to bury it, we would have two and a half times as much money in circulation as we have now, or have ever had. So that, while money would be plentiful, it would also be cheap, and might bring about an inflation which would upset our entire economic situation.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I share the viewpoint just expressed by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. In that connection, also, I am glad to have the confirmation of the Senator from Oklahoma, who has made a thorough study and a serious study of the monetary question, of the contention I have been making right along, that all this gold and all of this silver, or practically all of it, is coming into this country in payment for goods we are selling to the nations of the world. The Government of the United States is not going out into the markets and purchasing gold and silver in other nations of the earth in order to pay dollars for it. That gold comes here in exchange for things we are selling other nations, and when it gets into the United States, under our laws, then the Government does buy it at the rate which has been indicated. If we should stop the importation of gold into this country it would practically stop, to that extent, our exportation of products of the farm and factory.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I shall discuss that matter very briefly a little later in the course of my remarks.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not wish to have it appear from the observations of the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Kentucky that I advocate coining all this gold, eighteen billion, twelve billion of which belong to the Federal Reserve banks. I am talking about the gold we are still buying. I do not see any economy in issuing a bond, paying 3 percent on it, with which to buy a dollar's worth of gold, then burying the gold and having to pay interest on the bond for a long period. When a man comes to this country from Europe with a hundred dollars in gold, why do we not do as we do in the case of the Federal Reserve bank, say, "Yes; we will take the gold and give you this gold certificate, and you can go out and spend it, and buy all the commodities you want to buy."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to keep the RECORD straight. It is not correct to say that we are issuing bonds at any rate of interest for the purpose of buying gold. That is not the way the gold is handled. For example, if some bank in Russia or some bank in Great Britain or some bank anywhere else desires to establish dollar credits in the United States, they can send gold to their correspondent in the United States, either at San Francisco, where there is a mint, at New York, or Philadelphia, or at some other point. The gold is consigned to the bank in New York, or Philadelphia, or elsewhere, as the case may be. The gold is immediately sent to the mint, and there it is assayed and weighed and valued, and the American bank which is the correspondent of the foreign bank gives the foreign bank credit for the value of that gold. But the bank cannot keep the gold. The bank must turn the gold over to the Federal Reserve. The Federal Reserve gives the National bank or State bank credit for the value of the gold. Then the Federal Reserve bank cannot keep the gold. Whichever bank it may be turns the gold over to the Treasury and the Treasury issues a gold certificate. So there is no bond anywhere in the whole transaction. In that way we are not paying any sum whatever on account of the acceptance of the gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. And that gold certificate does not bear interest.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is merely a certificate of ownership in that much gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. President, save for the acceptance of silver mined domestically, we are under neither obligation nor mandate to buy or accept silver from any source. At this time our silver program is under complete control and presents no problem to our Government.

No Senator, so far as I know, has yet recommended that we stop accepting gold as payment for our exports, and, so far as I know, none of them has recommended that we lower the price per ounce of the gold we are accepting.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? I tried to follow his description of the method by which we acquired the gold. Foreign countries send it in here in payment for products. The products go out. The gold goes through the banks, as the Senator has described, and through the chain he sets forth, and finally the gold finds its place in a hole in the ground in Kentucky. How does that help our circulating medium?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it does not help our circulating medium.

Mr. SMITH. The point I am making is this: Let us say we sell a thousand dollars' worth of products. The products are paid for in gold. Ultimately the gold finds its place in a hole in the ground in Kentucky. The products are gone and we are poorer by the transaction than we were before we accepted the gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I hardly believe that statement is correct.

Mr. SMITH. Why is it not correct? The wherewithal used by the foreign country to pay for our products ultimately finds a sequestration out in Kentucky. How does that help our circulating medium?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It does not expand our circulating medium, Mr. President, but it does expand our credit.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The thousand dollars' worth of products that are sold to a foreign country have been paid for in this country to the producer. He gets his money in the circulating medium of this country. When that thousand dollars' worth of products is sold, the thousand dollars' worth of gold is sent here by some foreign bank and given over to an American bank, which turns it over to the Treasury and receives a certificate for a thousand dollars, which is a certificate of ownership, but the producer of the property has already been paid in the circulating medium of the country. So there is no economic or physical loss. The mere fact that the gold is deposited for safekeeping in a military fort does not mean that it is lost. It is available.

Mr. SMITH. I am not talking about it being lost. Indirectly, we are using the gold for the payment which was made to the producer. Is that what the Senator means?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no economic loss. There is no vacuum created because of this method of exchange.

Mr. SMITH. It is a Chinese puzzle.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it is not a Chinese puzzle. It is very simple.

Mr. SMITH. Well, it does not seem to be.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not going to take the time of the Senator from Oklahoma to explain it to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Well, I am a citizen of the country, and it seems to me that I am entitled to know where the stuff comes from that pays the producer in view of the amount of gold with which the foreign country paid for it. You cannot have something produced without it being paid for. If I am paid, I have to be paid in respect to the gold that came in. You cannot divorce cause from effect. A foreign country buys a thousand dollars' worth of American produce, for example, and pays for it in gold. Now, someone pays me a thousand dollars for that product by virtue of the gold transaction. That is an indirect way of using the gold without issuing a gold certificate. Is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, perhaps what I will now mention has some bearing upon the controversy just now before the Senate. A few days ago we saw in the public press that Russia was shipping $5,000,000 of gold to America to the account of the Chase National Bank. I took it upon myself to wire the Chase National Bank for information as to how this gold was being received, and I have a reply from the vice president of the Chase National Bank. The telegram is signed by Mr. J. C. Rovensky. The telegram reads as follows:

> In Mr. Aldrich's absence replying your telegram shipment, was usual transaction where a foreign bank shipped gold which was delivered to mint we receiving payment from Treasury Department and crediting consignor.

Mr. President, that simply means that someone in Russia desired to buy something in America. The Russian Government, or a corporation, or an individual in Russia, desiring to establish credit in America, procured gold and shipped that gold through its bank in Russia to the Chase National Bank in San Francisco. The Chase National Bank in San Francisco, or its agent, turned the gold over to the mint. The gold was assayed, it was weighed, and it was valued. Immediately then this gold had a value according to the certificate of the mint. The Chase National Bank could not keep the gold, so the Chase National Bank had to send it to the Treasury through the Federal Reserve Bank in San Francisco. In the end the Chase National Bank received a credit from the Treasury to the value of this gold. So the Russian Government, the Russian Corporation, or the Russion individual, can write a check on the Chase National Bank today for the things he or it desired to buy in America.

Mr. SMITH. But it was based on the gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It was based on the gold all along the line. This procedure does not increase the circulation in America, but it does increase the credit money of America, and it increases the reserves in the Federal Reserve System of America.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I wonder if the Senator would be willing to tell me what the situation would be if that bank or individual in Russia decided to get a credit in Japan, for example, and shipped the gold to Japan. What would it be worth there as compared with our dollar?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, gold is worth the same throughout the world, and the United States has fixed the price of gold. The value of gold everywhere in the world every day is based upon the American dollar, and the American dollar is based upon gold. Were it not for the fact that the United States dollar was based directly upon gold there would be absolute chaos throughout the world, because there would be no exchange; there would be no government that would have a single post to tie to, because there is no other money in the world save the dollar, that has a fixed gold content.

Every unit of every nation today is fixed in the terms of a dollar, so gold is worth throughout the world the same amount, based upon the American dollar. Were it not so, these nations would ship the gold to the United States and get dollars for it. The reason why the dollars are coming to the United States is because there is a slight discrepancy sometimes in the exchange rate. When there is a discrepancy in the exchange rate, gold comes to the United States.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, I seek enlightenment, because the Senator from Oklahoma is so well informed on this subject. I still would like to know if the Russian individual or corporation could get the same credit value in Japan as he receives in New York?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so, making allowances for the transportation cost and insurance.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator one question?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Under our present international monetary policy, does the Senator know of any method of paying for goods, for instance, purchased in this country, where there is not a balance in favor of the nationals of that country, other than by the payment of gold?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There are no other methods by which payments can be made save by goods or gold.

Mr. WAGNER. And not having a balance in their favor in goods they have to use gold in order to purchase our commodities?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly so, Mr. President. The balance of trade is in favor of the United States. There has not been a year in the last 10 years, so far as I know, in which we have not sold more goods abroad than we bought from abroad. That means that foreigners pay for the goods they buy in America as far as they can with goods; but, if they buy more goods here than they sell us, they must pay the balance in gold, because that is the only thing we will accept, except to the limited extent we have accepted silver.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WILEY. I am interested in getting a little illumination in relation to the gold certificate. That is issued by the Mint, the Senator says.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No; it is issued by the Treasury Department.

Mr. WILEY. By the Treasury Department. Is that not virtually money? Is not that transferable?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, if I should exhibit one of those gold certificates to the Senator from Wisconsin he could not tell the difference between it and one of the old-fashioned gold certificates we had in circulation about 10 years ago. They are the same size. The printing is practically the same. They are the same color. It looks exactly like a gold certificate for $20 or $100 or $1,000 or $10,000, but it is not legal tender, and it is not money in the sense that it can be circulated as money. It is only good for the redemption of gold when the Federal Reserve Bank desires to make payment to some foreign nation. The law makes it such.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. Perhaps I am asking the question too soon. Probably the Senator intends to answer it later. I should like to know if he believes, quite aside from what we are going to do with the gold in this country, that we are not being economically harmed by the purchase of foreign gold.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will discuss that a little later, and if the Senator will just withhold his question I will come to it in due course of my remarks, which will not be very long.

Having quoted from the remarks and purported remarks of the Senators mentioned, courtesy now demands that I pause, and, if requested, I shall gladly yield to either of my distinguished and able colleagues, or to all of them in order, to reaffirm their statements heretofore made or to disclaim or renounce such statements, or to clarify and make more definite and certain their position or positions on the gold policy and program of this administration.

I hear no complaint, although I think three of the Senators from whom I quoted are not now upon the floor.

Mr. Aldrich, the head of the largest private banking institution in the world, makes some worth-while contributions to an understanding of this so-called gold problem. Some of his statements are as follows:

> As long as the war lasts, and probably for some time afterward, the chances are that gold will continue to flow to the United States.

Relative to a method for handling this increasing and continuous flow of gold to the United States, Mr. Aldrich says:

> Several suggestions have been advanced for dealing with the immediate problem. The crudest of all is that the United States should cease buying gold altogether.

If we should stop accepting gold as money in payment for our exports, according to Mr. Aldrich the effect would be as follows:

> Not only would this action be reflected immediately in the demoralization of the foreign exchange market and in violent disturbances to domestic and international trade, but it would lead foreign nations to stiffen still further their controls over trade, and so detach gold yet more widely from its normal function of redressing trade balances.

Referring to the proposal that we reduce the price of gold per ounce, Mr. Aldrich says that—

> The proposal has serious drawbacks. Through affecting the dollar value of an important item, gold, in the balance of payments between this country and those nations which are large producers of gold, a reduction in price would most assuredly cause exchange rates with them to decline. And similar effects would follow in the exchange rates with nonproducing countries that own stocks of gold which they may desire to use in settling trade balances with us. Finally, in testing the validity of this suggestion, we should not lose sight of the fact that we ourselves are the largest owners of gold in the world. To scale down the value of one of our most important national possessions seems an unduly expensive way to go about the correction of our difficulties. It has been estimated that the loss would amount to about half a billion dollars for every dollar by which the price of gold is reduced below its present level. And the loss to a large extent would have to be made up by a further increase in the public debt.

Further, in reference to the reduction of the price per ounce of gold, Mr. Aldrich says that—

> Time has run too far to permit us to return to the former price. We must keep the price where it now is.

At this point let me refer to the conclusions of one of the world's outstanding financial experts. I refer to Dr. W. Randolph Burgess, vice chairman of the National City Bank and former vice president of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York.

Relative to our financial program, Dr. Burgess has the following to say:

> We cannot go back. * * * We cannot turn back to the simpler monetary system of the past.

Dr. Burgess admits that we have managed our money in the past, that we manage it now, and that we must continue to manage it in the future. He says that—

We should, however, have no illusions that the restoration of the gold standard would eliminate management.

Dr. Burgess makes some suggestions for the improvement of our management of money. He stresses a recommendation that we "improve our money management personnel."

I interpret the effect of the various recommendations made by Dr. Burgess to be that we should declare by law a definite monetary policy and that after such policy has been declared we should create a monetary supreme court and then demand of such financial tribunal the management of our money in the best interest of all the people and interest of our common country.

So much for the contributions made by our congressional colleagues, bankers, economists, publishers, and editors for a solution of our present monetary troubles and problems to date.

As a basis for my interpretation, explanation, and conclusions, let me lay down the following predicates:

The first unit of our monetary system was the silver dollar, containing the same weight of pure silver as the silver dollar in circulation today.

Later the gold dollar, with a fixed parity in weight with the silver dollar, was added to our monetary system. During the administration of Andrew Jackson the weight of the gold dollar was reduced twice. The result of such reductions was to bid up the price of gold per ounce.

The weight of pure silver in our standard silver dollar has never been changed since the foundation of our Government.

The weight of the gold dollar has been changed three times. Each time the amount of pure gold was reduced, and such reduction meant that the price of gold per ounce has been raised on three separate occasions since 1789.

What are the pertinent facts relative to our monetary system today?

By the act approved March 14, 1900, known as the Gold Standard Act, the gold dollar was made the standard of all our money. Section 1 of this act is as follows:

That the dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, as established by section 3511 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

By the act approved May 12, 1933, the President was given power to reduce the gold content of the dollar in the following language:

(2) By proclamation to fix the weight of the gold dollar in grains, nine-tenths fine, * * * and such gold dollar, the weight of which is so fixed, shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity, but in no event shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed so as to reduce its present weight by more than 50 percent.

By the act approved January 30, 1934, the title of all gold in the United States was vested in the United States. Section 2 of such act provides that:

(a) Upon the approval of this act all right, title, and interest, and every claim of the Federal Reserve Board, of every Federal Reserve bank, and of every Federal Reserve agent, in and to any and all gold coin and gold bullion shall pass to and are hereby vested in the United States, and in payment therefor credits in equivalent amounts in dollars are hereby established in the Treasury. * * *

Section 8 of such act provides as follows:

With the approval of the President, the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase gold in any amounts, at home or abroad, with any direct obligations, coin, or currency of the United States, authorized by law, or with any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, at such rates and upon such terms and conditions as he may deem most advantageous to the public interest. * * * All gold so purchased shall be included as an asset of the general fund of the Treasury.

Under this law all gold in the United States today save that held out legally for curios and antiques is the property of the United States.

Section 12 of this act, relating to the weight of the gold dollars, provides as follows:

Nor shall the weight of the gold dollar be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its present weight.

Acting under the power thus conferred on January 31, 1934, the President, by proclamation, fixed the gold content of the dollar as follows:

By virtue of all other authority vested in me (I) do hereby proclaim, order, direct, declare, and fix the weight of the gold dollar to be 15 5/21 grains, nine-tenths fine, from and after the date and hour of this proclamation.

He had the power to devalue the gold dollar under the act of 1933, but under the act of 1934 some limitations were imposed.

As the law now stands, the President has no power to increase the weight of the gold dollar above the 15 5/21 grains, nine-tenths fine, as provided in his proclamation of January 31, hence has no power to reduce the price paid for gold below the $35 per fine ounce.

To increase the weight of the gold dollar, which means a reduction of the price of gold per fine ounce, will require additional legislation.

The President has a law of questionable validity for still further reducing the weight of the gold dollar from 15 5/21 grains to some 12 9/10 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine. Should he still further decrease the weight of the gold dollar to the limit of the law, he would thereby increase the value of gold from $35 to $41.34 per fine ounce.

Let me here state two undenied and undeniable gold principles:

First, to decrease the weight of the gold monetary unit thereby in the same ratio increases the price of gold per ounce. The corollary to the foregoing principle is—to increase the weight of such gold monetary unit thereby in the same ratio decreases the price of gold per ounce.

Second, to decrease the weight of the gold monetary unit is to raise in a comparable ratio the price of goods, wares, and commodities, which are priced in gold throughout the world. The corollary to the foregoing principle is—to increase the weight of the gold monetary unit is to decrease in a comparable ratio the price of goods, wares, and commodities priced in gold throughout the world.

Now I shall reduce the stated abstract principles to concrete form.

Formerly the gold dollar contained 25 8/10 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, so that the pure gold in the dollar was slightly in excess of one-twentieth of an ounce of pure gold. The weight of the former gold dollar meant that 1 ounce of pure gold could be coined into 20 67/100 gold dollars. Hence such a weighted dollar fixed the price of gold at $20.67 per fine ounce.

Inasmuch as gold was and is our basic, primary money, it is an obvious fact that when we fix the weight of the gold dollar, such act automatically and positively fixes the price of gold per ounce in terms of dollars.

Along about 1930, when the demand for gold had become so great as to make the metal, as valued in property, goods, services, and commodities, so valuable that the people of the world could not produce and secure enough property to exchange for needed gold, all nations then began to reduce the size and weight of their monetary units.

Following such world-wide policy, we enacted legislation, as previously mentioned, and reduced the size and weight of the gold dollar. When we fixed such weight at 15 5/21 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, we made it possible to coin an ounce of gold into 35 gold dollars, so that if we should desire to return gold to circulation in the form of gold coins at the present weight and fineness of the dollar, we could coin 35 dollars out of each ounce of gold we now have on deposit in the Treasury.

Speakers and writers, in discussing our so-called gold problem, refer to the fact that we accept gold upon the basis of $35 per fine ounce, which is a fact. But it might be more helpful and understandable if they were to discuss the matter from the basis of the size and weight of the gold dollar in relation to the gold ounce and the value of the gold dollar as measured in property, wares, services, and commodities, rather than to continue to criticize the Government for its policy of accepting gold on the basis of $35 per fine ounce.

All things considered, the indictment of our Government for accepting Russian gold in payment for American goods, wares, services, and commodities is not supported by the facts.

We are not at war with Russia. Hence to refuse to trade with that country would be a warlike act. We have the goods to sell; and as gold is the best and only real money in the world, we have every reason to accept the order for goods and the gold in payment therefor from the Soviet Republic.

Mr. MALONEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. MALONEY. I am very much impressed by the Senator's last statement. I wonder how long the Senator thinks we may continue with that situation if we continue to bury the gold and not make use of it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, in the latter part of my remarks I suggest the dangers in our present policy. I will say by way of explanation—because this subject is technical and hard to follow—that there are three prongs to our gold problem.

First, we are criticized for accepting Russian gold.

Second, we are criticized for paying $35 an ounce for gold. It is claimed that that is too high a price.

Third, we are criticized for having so much gold on hand.

I am now discussing the first two problems. I am stating that there is no just criticism of our Government for accepting gold from Russia.

Second, I state that under the law gold has been fixed at $35 an ounce, and to reduce the price of gold below $35 an ounce has the effect of increasing the weight of the gold dollar, which means that dollars become more valuable; and as the dollar goes up prices go down. So those who criticize the price of $35 per ounce are criticizing indirectly the present prices of our commodities throughout the United States. If they want the price of gold reduced, they must by inference want lower prices for the things the people of America produce, such as farm products, raw materials, and so forth.

Mr. MALONEY. I should like to make it clear that I am not at all in disagreement with the Senator's discussion of the first two prongs, as he calls them.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have not yet come to the third one.

Mr. MALONEY. I am very anxious to hear the Senator's view on the third, because it seems to me that may be the vital issue.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall come to that point in just a moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. At our present rate of receiving gold from other countries, how long does the Senator think it will be before we shall have all the gold in the world?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, there is only about $28,000,000,000 of gold in the world.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Of which we have $18,000,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There is about $27,750,000,000. So, to be conservative, it is not far wrong to assume that there is $28,000,000,000 of monetary gold in the world. Of that sum we have $18,100,000,000. This gold came to us at the rate of $3,200,000,000 for the year. That is more than $200,000,000 in gold a month. If we receive $3,200,000,000 this year, $3,200,000,000 next year, and $3,200,000,000 the following year, we shall have all the gold in the world of which we now have any trace. I admit that that would be bad. I shall discuss that point in just a moment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I just picked up an editorial from the Philadelphia Record, which says that at our present rate we shall have all the gold in the world by 1943. I have not figured it out. We shall have exchanged our goods—automobiles, cotton, and all other goods—for gold at $35 an ounce. We shall have all the gold in the world buried down in Kentucky. What is to happen to us when Europe says, "You have all the gold. Keep it. We do not want it"?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall discuss that question in just a moment. I am almost ready to undertake it now.

Mr. McKELLAR. How does the figure since the outbreak of the war affect the situation? Are we now receiving more gold than we received before that time?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I should not say we are receiving more, but it has not diminished. It may have slightly increased, but it is approximately the same.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly we shall get more gold, because that is the only thing foreign purchasers have with which to pay for our goods. When the gold is gone, what will they use to pay for our goods?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I shall come to that question in just a moment. I have almost reached it.

The cost of producing gold in Russia, in Alaska, in California, in Georgia, or in the Rand has had nothing to do with the fixing of the price at $35 per ounce.

If there is a monopoly in gold, such monopoly has been brought about by the Government of the United States.

If there be just criticism because of the price of $35 per ounce for gold, then such criticism must be leveled directly at the Congress.

By the act of May 12, 1933, the Congress gave the President the power to raise the price of gold from $20.67 to $41.34 per fine ounce, and by the act approved January 30, 1934, this Congress directed that the weight of the gold dollar should not be fixed in any event at more than 60 percent of its then present weight.

When the Congress fixed the 60-percent limitation, the President was directed to raise the value of gold from $20.67 to at least $34.45 per fine ounce. For convenience of computation, the price was fixed at $35 per ounce.

Mr. President, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is not present. He voted for the law which directed the President to fix a price of not less than $34.45 per fine ounce; yet he is criticizing the price of $35 an ounce up and down the length and breadth of the country.

I have stated the result of refusing to accept Russian gold.

Now I ask, What would be the result of reducing the price per ounce for gold?

Some of the results would be as follows:

First, we now have over $18,000,000,000 in gold in the Treasury. This means that we have over 515,000,000 ounces of the yellow metal. For every dollar of reduction in the price per ounce of gold we would lose $515,000,000. Should the price be reduced to the former price of $20.67 per ounce, we would lose over $7,500,000,000 in the dollar value of our gold stock. The foregoing is not all that we would lose.

Secondly, should we reduce the price per ounce, the effect would be to increase the gold content of the dollar. This would make the gold dollar larger and heavier, hence more valuable; and to the extent that we make the dollar more valuable, to the same extent we reduce prices.

Distinguished Senators complain at the high price of gold, and the effect of their complaint is to demand that prices be lowered.

The distinguished junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT] has in effect demanded higher prices for farm products; hence he has not criticized and cannot criticize the present price of gold as being too high.

On the other hand, distinguished Senators—the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] and the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]—have criticized the present gold price as being too high; hence the result of their demand is for lower prices for the products produced in both Delaware and Michigan as well as throughout the entire United States.

Mr. President, those who condemn the present price of gold as being too high must at the same time condemn prices of property, wares, services, and commodities likewise as being too high.

So much for the criticisms, first, of the policy of accepting Russian gold; and, second, of the existing law that we must pay at least $35 per fine ounce for gold.

Now to the last criticism, that we now have too much gold.

Gold is money—the best and only real money in the world—hence those who say we have too much gold must mean that we have too much money in our Treasury.

While I contend that the Russian gold and the $35-per-ounce price for gold present no problem to our country, yet I admit that the constant trek of gold from the other nations to the United States does present a problem, and a most serious one indeed.

This problem is one not only for our country but for the entire world.

Mr. President, what are the facts which constitute this problem?

One phase of the problem is the disposition of our hoard of gold, which now totals over $18,000,000,000. While no one knows definitely just how much monetary gold there is in the world, the best estimate seems to be that the world monetary gold stock is approximately $28,000,000,000; so that we now have in our Treasury some eighteen twenty-eighths of the total monetary gold of the world. The United States—one nation—has over $18,000,000,000, and the other 50 nations together have less than $10,000,000,000.

During recent years gold has been flowing to the United States at the rate of over $200,000,000 per month; and unless this gold flow is stopped or retarded, it will not be long until we shall have here in the United States practically all of the monetary gold in the world.

From a practical standpoint, this gold is not serving any good purpose here in the United States for, immediately upon its receipt, it is transported to Fort Knox, Ky., where it is placed in a strong vault underground and protected by guards and soldiers stationed at that Army post.

As this gold comes to the United States it depletes the supply abroad, and the scarcer gold becomes abroad the greater the demand for the remaining metal; so that gold is appreciating in value, as measured in property, throughout the world.

The problem of the other nations is to retain or to secure sufficient gold with which to back and support their exchange; and our problem is to make some disposition of our existing gold so that it will serve for our people some good, useful, and profitable purpose.

It would seem that the only proper use we can make of our surplus gold is to bring about its redistribution so that the value of gold will not appreciate too greatly, and, further, to the end that other nations may secure gold with which to support their monetary exchange.

During recent days this phase of our so-called gold problem has engaged the attention of many of our financial writers and prominent economists.

As to the problem which confronts our country, Roger W. Babson has just had the following to say:

> The problem is this: We have 70 percent of the world's gold. That is too much. Other nations have little gold to pay us for the goods they want to buy from us. This makes our dollar so mighty that more "timid" gold is sent to us, thus weakening other currencies still further. This automatically boosts our prices in world markets in terms of foreign currencies and hence cuts down our exports, increases our unemployment. Under normal conditions, the situation would correct itself, but the dollar occupies its exalted position, not because of the United States economic strength, but because of world economic weakness. While there is complete disagreement as to how to solve this riddle, there is unanimous agreement on the existence of this gold danger.

Dr. E. A. Goldenweiser, Director of the Division of Research and Statistics for the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, has just published an article entitled "The Gold Problem Today," and in that article we find the following statements and conclusions:

> It is interesting to speculate about the ultimate fate of our $17,600,000,000 of gold. The most satisfactory way to reduce the pile would be through the development of a world situation in which the United States would lose gold as the result of excess purchases of goods and services from abroad.
> It is too optimistic, however, to think that much gold would flow out in this way, partly for the reason that few countries after the war will be in a position to acquire gold rather than goods from abroad. They will be in need of materials and capital for reconstruction, and the fulfillment of deferred demands will probably occupy their own productive resources fully and also create a need for foreign-made goods.
> Under such circumstances, a flight of capital from the United States, which is hard to conceive, or investment abroad, which is not likely to assume large proportions, would offer the only occasion for losing gold. Some post-war stabilization loans may conceivably be made, but the amounts involved are not apt to be large.
> It seems, therefore, that the problem of our huge gold stock is likely to stay with us for a long while and that it may even increase if gold continues to flow into this country. No simple solution to the problem can be devised. The ultimate solution will have to be a part of the answer to the much broader problems of restoration of world stability and international trade. It will also be bound up with rationalization of our own economy.

From the foregoing statements, conclusions, and recommendations, it is obvious that our vast amount of gold constitutes a real problem, and one that must be solved at an early date.

On February 9 of this year our combined stocks of gold and silver totaled some $19,852,000,000, and on the same day we had in circulation a total of some $7,365,000,000 of all kinds of money; so that on that date we could have redeemed every dollar in circulation with gold—dollar for dollar—and still have had the sum of $12,487,000,000 in gold and silver left in our Treasury.

The necessity for finding a solution to this problem must be obvious to every citizen.

To be specific, the following questions confront us: What can we do, what should we do, and what must we do, about this problem of our surplus gold?

Mr. President, we could do any one of the following things, or we might formulate a policy by combining some of the things possible to be done with our gold:

First. We might begin using our gold to defray governmental expenses.

Second. We might use the gold to meet maturing governmental obligations.

Third. We might devise a plan for redistributing our surplus gold among the solvent nations of the world. This might be done by the formation of a world bank, and through such bank we might make sales and loans of gold on approved securities; and, should such a plan be worked out, the following ends might be attained:

(a) Such a program would make of the United States the world's banker.

(b) Through sales or loans, gold could be furnished to stabilize the currencies of such nations as would thus cooperate with the United States.

(c) With gold for support, nations could fix a gold content for their monetary units and then stabilize such valued units among the moneys of the world. This would not necessarily mean that the world is to resume the coining of gold and resume specie payments. Our dollar has a fixed gold content for exchange purposes, but we have not heretofore coined and do not now plan to coin gold into dollars, or to begin the payment of domestic obligations in either gold coin or bullion.

(d) Such a use of our surplus gold would bring to the United States an added income in the form of interest on such loans and would replenish the Treasury for such sales of gold as might be made.

(e) World trade would be increased and the United States would secure at least a fair share of such increase.

(f) We could use the power of our gold in such a way as to discourage war and to establish and promote permanent peace.

Mr. President, in a totalitarian state the head of the government is able to dictate and to rule without either the knowledge or consent of his subjects, but in a democracy the ruling power must advise and make plain the problems which confront the government; hence, the facts and suggestions relative to our gold problem should be given the widest possible publicity, to the end that the people may have a chance to consider and, through their representatives, to work out a solution of this all-important problem.

Mr. President, since I began to make my remarks an aggregation of farmers has assembled in Washington. This group has passed a resolution, dated today and inasmuch as it bears very largely upon the gold problem and our monetary problem as it affects prices, I ask permission to have the resolution printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas agriculture is our basic industry, and it is evident there will be no sound recovery in the United States until farmers receive the 1926 prices as a minimum for their commodities; and

Whereas agriculture received less than 8 percent of the total national income in 1939, although the total number of our people living and working on farms and in the rural communities immediately dependent upon farms, is more than 26 percent of the population; and

Whereas during recent years many of the foreign markets have been lost to our farmers; and

Whereas in 1939 more than $1,000,000,000 of agricultural products were permitted to be imported into the United States to compete with the products of our farmers; and

Whereas after 7 years of cooperation with the Department of Agriculture in their A. A. A. and curtailing production program, prices now received by farmers are far below the cost of production, in consequence of which many of them are unable to pay interest, debts, and taxes, and are otherwise without purchasing power; and

Whereas we believe the fundamental problem of agriculture is not one of overproduction but underconsumption due to lack of adequate purchasing power and medium of exchange; and

Whereas the tax burden is so crushing that it exacts more than 25 percent of the national income, largely falling upon the farmer and laborer, thus curtailing or destroying the purchasing power of the consumer; and

Whereas this condition in a large measure is due to the national debt of more than $42,000,000,000; and

Whereas there is in the United States more than $18,000,000,000 in gold and more than $1,800,000,000 in silver; and

Whereas there is outstanding less than seven billion four hundred millions of currency; and

Whereas economists, bankers, and businessmen agree that adequate commodity prices are necessary for national recovery; and

Whereas it is essential to a sound, prosperous agricultural industry, general business activity, gainful employment of labor, a balanced Budget, and a sound national economy that agricultural prices be restored to at least the 1926 level; and

Whereas it is essential to such national recovery that the Government adopt a sound monetary, financial, and tax program: Be it therefore

Resolved, That we, the executive members of the National Agricultural Conference, urge upon the Congress of the United States legislative action to put into effect the following:

First. That the value of gold be definitely fixed on the basis of $41.34 per ounce.

Second. That gold be put in circulation or currency be issued on the basis of $41.34 per ounce to redeem United States interest-bearing obligations until the 1926 commodity price level has been restored, and thereafter be maintained a price level that is in the best interest of national welfare.

Third. That in coordination with this program uneconomic and destructive taxes be repealed or lowered so that there may be an incentive for capital to be put into immediate constructive use.

Resolved, That the secretary forward a copy of this resolution to the members of the United States Senate and other Members of Congress.

Dated at Washington, D. C., this 15th day of February 1940.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Linus C. Glotzbach, of Minnesota, to be regional director, region VII.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask that this nomination be laid over until next week.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator spoke to me about this matter. It seems to me the request is reasonable, and I am perfectly willing that the matter shall go over, but the Senator agreed that it could be determined on Monday.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I cannot say that it will be determined then, but I will make my statement at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the request of the Senator from Minnesota cover both of the nominations under the Work Projects Administration?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I should like to have the nominations of Mr. Glotzbach and of Mr. Stolte go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be passed over.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN.

Rev. G. Ellis Williams, D. D., superintendent of the Washington west district of the Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our refuge and our strength, we commend ourselves to Thee this day.

We confess our sins as individuals and as a nation, and seek Thy pardoning grace. Give us the mastery over sin and temptation.

We recognize Thee as the giver of every good gift, and we know that with Thee there is no variableness nor shadow of turning. Thou art the unchanging Father, our rock of refuge. In this confused and confusing world, we turn to Thee and pray that the balm of Thy healing presence may be on our Nation and the nations of the world. To that end may war cease and peace attend our way. This day may we hear the lowly Nazarene say,

Peace, my peace, I give unto you, not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled, neither let it be afraid.

We ask it, with the forgiveness of our sins, in His redeeming name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 186) entitled "An act to amend section 798 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, relating to murder in the first degree," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. KING, Mr. VAN NUYS, and Mr. NORRIS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE COMMENCEMENT OF THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SUPREME COURT

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably (H. Rept. No. 1604) a resolution (H. Con. Res. 45) and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 45

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the proceedings at the various ceremonies in commemoration of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the commencement of the first session of the Supreme Court of the United States, together with such additional matter as the Joint Committee on Arrangements in charge of these ceremonies may deem fitting and appropriate, in connection with this historical event, be printed, with illustrations, as a document; and that 200,000 additional copies be printed, of which 50,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 150,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition in order to ask the gentleman a question. What will this cost? I probably should leave that question for the economic gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], but the gentleman did not snap into it with his usual celerity and vim.

Mr. JARMAN. It will cost $4,709.46. That is the estimate.

Mr. RANKIN. That is the estimate for the entire cost?

Mr. JARMAN. That is the estimate for the entire cost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. JARMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Printing, I report back favorably (H. Rept. No. 1605) a resolution (H. Con. Res. 46), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Concurrent Resolution 46

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the Printing Act approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed for its use 2,000 additional copies of the hearings held before said committee during the current session on the resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS—MINORITY VIEWS

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the minority members of the Ways and Means Committee may have until midnight tomorrow night within which to file minority views on the reciprocal-trade bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

THE MONETARY SITUATION

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, we listened the other day to a very inspiring and eloquent speech on the subject of Thomas Edison by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. I want to add just one note about Thomas Edison this morning, and I quote from him:

> The only dynamite that works in this country is the dynamite of a sound idea. I think we are getting a sound idea on the money question. The people have an instinct which tells them that something is wrong and that the wrong somehow centers in money.
> Don't allow them to confuse you with the cry of "paper money." The danger of paper money is precisely the danger of gold—if you get too much it is no good. There is just one rule for money and that is to have enough to carry all the legitimate trade that is waiting to move. Too little and too much are both bad. But enough to move trade, enough to prevent stagnation on the one hand, not enough to permit speculation on the other hand, is the proper ratio.
> If our Nation can issue a dollar bond it can issue a dollar bill. The element that makes the bond good makes the bill good also. The difference between the bond and the bill is that the bond lets money brokers collect twice the amount of the bond and an additional 20-percent interest, whereas the currency pays nobody but those who contribute directly in some useful way.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a brief editorial.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I shall not object, I want to say to the gentleman from California that while I did not cover that phase of Mr. Edison's life work in my recent address, I thoroughly agree with him on his monetary policies. I think the money question is the outstanding problem with which we are now confronted. We are not going to relieve present conditions and restore permanent prosperity until the money question is properly handled.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend in the RECORD a copy of joint assembly resolution No. 9 relative to discrimination in steamer service freight rates between New York and California ports and the Panama Canal Zone.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include correspondence between Secretary Hull and myself on the subject of relations with South America.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS] just called our attention to the monetary situation. The gentleman is always very earnest and very conscientious in his search for relief for those who are unemployed. I am right, am I not?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. That is right.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that some of this money might be distributed more equitably.

For example, Miss Beatrice Stern, assistant secretary, National Labor Relations Board, $5,600. Max W. Stern, her husband, assistant director of informational service of Social Security Board, $7,500. No children—just the two of them.

Remembering that so many are unemployed, with the American Youth Congress here demanding opportunities to work, why should the Government follow the policy of placing two top-notch jobs in one family?

Some of these New Deal agencies seem to be a family matter.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I shall offer an amendment to the naval appropriation bill when it is read under the 5-minute rule, to strike out appropriations for the building of 1 battleship. This bill provides for the starting building of 2 new battleships. Probably both should be stricken out. If this bill passes in its present shape, this will make a total under construction of 10 battleships, 9 cruisers, 3 aircraft carriers, 50 destroyers, 26 submarines, 2 destroyer tenders, 3 large seaplane tenders, 6 small seaplane tenders, 2 submarine tenders, 3 mine sweepers, 2 oilers, 3 fleet tugs, 1 mine layer, 1 repair ship, and so forth.

Have you been able to find anyone in the naval service, or any Member of Congress, who can tell us what it is going to cost for the upkeep of this Navy 5 years from now? I have not. Nobody will come out and tell you what it is going to cost for upkeep. In my opinion it will be a burden that the American people cannot stand. We do not need such a large Navy, and I am for adequate defense. No nation from foreign shores is going to come to our land to fight us. We do not want them to and there is no good reason why they should come here if we stay at home and mind our own business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an article from the current issue of the Reader's Digest on lewd literature.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does this article on lewd literature include the article which appeared in the papers about the show the Social Security boys put on in Baltimore the other night?

Mr. GILLIE. No, it does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein portions of an article from the Chicago Tribune of February 11, 1940.

Mr. RANKIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, on what subject?

Mr. GILLIE. On the subject of sugar.

Mr. RANKIN. That is the most delightful subject I have known the Chicago Tribune to present lately, so I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUYER of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a resolution passed by the Judiciary Committee on the late Honorable Wallace E. Pierce, of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein a brief editorial published in the Baltimore Sun on February 12.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, on what subject?

Mr. SPRINGER. On the life and character of Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD, and to insert therein a statement of the benefits to be received by an extension of the reciprocal-trade agreements, prepared by the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

JOINT COMMITTEE TO ARRANGE FOR THE INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT-ELECT OF THE UNITED STATES IN 1941

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up Senate Resolution 32.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Concurrent Resolution 32

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That a joint committee consisting of three Senators and three Representatives, to be appointed by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, respectively, is authorized to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on the 20th day of January 1941.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 is the usual resolution that has been passed every 4 years providing for the appointment of a joint committee of three Senators and three Representatives to make necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the President-elect of the United States on January 20, 1941.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. As I understand, this is the usual resolution that is passed every 4 years?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. It is identical in phraseology with previous resolutions?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. So I am informed; yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. The gentleman does not know, then?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. This is a Senate resolution. I understand it is identical in phraseology with previous resolutions of this character. However, I have not personally checked it.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Certainly.

Mr. RANKIN. Under the so-called lame-duck amendment, if one candidate for President should fail to receive a majority of the electoral votes, then, of course, the election is thrown into the House; and, contrary to the form of procedure theretofore provided, as I understand it, the new Congress and not the old one would elect the President. Am I correct?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. That is my understanding; yes, that is the way I read the twelfth and twentieth amendments.

Mr. RANKIN. Then should we find ourselves in that predicament next January, it would be impossible to put this resolution into effect, would it not?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Congress meets on the 3d of January. The inauguration of the President will take place on the 20th of January.

Mr. RANKIN. That gives Congress only 17 days in which to elect a President.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I think the gentleman from Mississippi—as have many others of us—has seen a number of difficulties with the so-called lame-duck amendment—the twentieth amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. I see a great many.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The subject has been discussed several times on the floor of the House by the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. RANKIN. How is that?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has pointed out some of these difficulties from time to time.

Mr. RANKIN. If this election is thrown into the House, as I understand it, the Congress would have to select the President from one of the three highest candidates, each State casting 1 vote. It seems to me entirely improbable, if we were to get into a contest of that kind, that it would be disposed of within 2 or 3 weeks. I am wondering if any provision in the resolution will take care of the situation in case there is a deadlock that would carry beyond the 17 days.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. There is no express provision in this resolution, but I believe that difficulty would be promptly and properly taken care of by the Congress if any such situation should arise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 344 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 344

Resolved, That a special committee of seven be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives to investigate and report to the House not later than January 3, 1941, the campaign expenditures of the various candidates for the House of Representatives in both parties, or candidates of parties other than or independent of the Democratic or Republican Parties, the names of persons, firms, associations, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the methods of collection and expenditures of such sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof but as to the use of any other means or influences, including the promise or use of patronage, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in necessary legislation or in deciding any contests which might be instituted involving the right to a seat in the House of Representatives.

The investigation hereby provided for in all the respects above enumerated shall apply to candidates and contests before primaries, conventions, and the contests and campaigns of the general election in 1940, or any special election held prior to January 3, 1941. Said committee is hereby authorized to act upon its own initiative and upon such information which in its judgment may be reasonable and reliable. Upon complaint being made before such committee, under oath, by any person, persons, candidates, or political committee setting forth allegations as to facts which, under this resolution, it would be the duty of said committee to investigate, said committee shall investigate such charges as fully as though it were acting upon its own motion, unless, after hearings on such complaints, the committee shall find that such allegations in said complaints are immaterial or untrue.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act during the adjournment of the Congress, and that said committee or any subcommitee thereof is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpenas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties as prescribed by law.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 1, strike out "seven" and insert "five."

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, this resolution—House Resolution 344—is in the usual form of resolution passed every 2 years for the purpose of investigating campaign expenditures, and so forth, of the various candidates for the House of Representatives. It is the same in form as similar resolutions adopted each 2 years since I have been a Member of the House. The only variance from the same form has been that sometimes the special committee has been of seven and sometimes of five members. It seemed to Rules Committee that five on this special committee would be quite sufficient. Therefore Rules Committee proposed the amendment to the resolution reducing the membership of the special committee from seven to five.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Is not this going behind the primaries a new departure?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. It has been very much of a question whether the House has any control over the primaries or other methods by which candidates for Representatives from the respective States are selected. The language in here is the same as that used for a long time. I think no effort has been made by any such House committee to investigate primaries. I made an exhaustive study of that question a couple of years ago. I believe no special committee of this sort has ever attempted to enter into any investigation as to how candidates for Congress are selected. I have concluded that—certainly since the Force Act was repealed—it is not within the power of a special House committee to investigate the method of nominating candidates for Congress because that is, I believe, within the exclusive jurisdiction of the States.

Mr. RANKIN. I seriously doubt the advisability of giving a congressional committee the right to go behind the primary nominations or the convention nominations in these investigations. Suppose you did the same thing with reference to Presidential candidates. Are you going to make an investigation of all the campaign funds and all campaign contributions of every candidate for President before the convention, then use that when it comes to the question of electing a President if the proposition should be thrown into the House for consideration?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I think that would have to be taken up by statute and not by House resolution. The theory on which the appointment of this committee is based is that under the Constitution the House is "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own Members." This is for the purpose of investigating promptly complaints based on alleged violations of the Corrupt Practices Act to the end that, if a contest should be filed, the House would be in possession of some facts assembled at or about the time of such alleged violations. It is also believed that the mere existence of such special committee should serve as a deterrent to any who might contemplate such violations.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not understand the gentleman's answer to my question a while ago. Is this the first time that Congress has ever attempted to go behind the primaries in an investigation?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. This is the form of resolution that has been adopted by the House for many years, certainly ever since I came to the House in 1933.

Mr. RANKIN. There have been no investigations of primary elections under it?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I was chairman of such special committee appointed 2 years ago. I reached the conclusion, after careful investigation of decisions of the Supreme Court, that, since repeal of the Force Act, there has been no power in such special committee to investigate the conduct of primaries or other methods of selecting candidates for Congress.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN] stated that the Newberry case came under it, but Newberry was tried by the Senate on a motion to expel on the proposition of the corrupt expenditure of campaign funds in a primary.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HOFFMAN. The amount expended at that time was very, very small compared with what is spent now.

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know what they are spending now. But I heard Newberry admit he spent $196,000.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I was thinking of the $470,000 that John Lewis contributed to the last campaign fund.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman wants to go into the Republican fund, he will probably find there are millions. I am talking about the primary elections.

Mr. HOFFMAN. We spent our own money. You spent Government money.

Mr. RANKIN. The only difference is you wrung it from one crowd and John L. Lewis wrung it from another.

But I do not care to go into these Michigan elections. I am a little bit apprehensive about the extent of the powers granted under this resolution. If we are going to investigate every primary campaign, it seems to me we are going far afield in this House when it has the right to expel a man at any time because of misconduct. I am not going to make all these fights, but I doubt the advisability of passing a resolution of this kind.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I may say to the gentleman that the resolution was introduced by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN]. I assume that, as the author of the resolution, he would probably be appointed chairman of the special committee. I do not know what conclusion he might reach; but certainly, after the investigation I made, I reached the conclusion that we had no power under a resolution of this sort in spite of those words in there to investigate primary campaign expenditures or to go behind the law as fixed by the respective States.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand, the gentleman is not in favor of going behind the primaries?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I reached the conclusion we had no power so to do. That is my own opinion.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois rose.

Mr. RANKIN. Would the gentleman agree to an amendment striking out that part of the resolution?

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I believe I had better yield, if you please, to the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague on the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Inasmuch as this is the usual and customary resolution, the minority side does not require any time.

Mr. RANKIN. If the Republicans can stand investigation, we certainly can.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] for 1 minute.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, while you are considering this matter of the preservation of the integrity of elections, I want to do what I have been doing every year for about 6 or 8 years, direct your attention to the fact that under the existing system it is possible to elect a President by fraud and nothing can be done about it.

This is a pretty strong statement. Let me make a little explanation. When we passed the lame-duck amendment, as you know, we moved the time for the inauguration of the President from March back to January but we did not move back the time for the election, so we left about 41 days, according to my recollection, between the time when the electors are elected and the time when they meet to vote for the President.

There is no one in this Chamber who does not know that it is impossible to gear up our judicial machinery so that in those 41 days there can be inaugurated proceedings and a determination of the question of whether or not there has been fraud in the election of electors.

I have been calling the attention of the House to that fact and for 6 or 7 years I have been introducing a bill to correct that situation, but we just sit here and do nothing about it. One of these times we are going to be face to face with serious charges with reference to the election of a President and not a thing can be done about it. It is about time that we were getting busy; while we cannot do anything about the coming election, we can enact legislation now and make it applicable to the election of the President after this next election. This would give our legislators plenty of time to modify their existing law so that only one general election would be required. I propose moving the election date from November to October. The present law can be redrafted and a week or 10 days additional can be gained there. But as it is we are in a perfectly inexcusable situation. With none too much time originally between the election and the inauguration, to change the inauguration time from March to January and leave the election time exactly where it was when the inauguration was in March is a serious reflection upon the Congress. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an address delivered by myself on Lincoln Day in Clarksburg, W. Va.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet tomorrow, Friday, February 16, 1940, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

NAVY DEPARTMENT AND NAVAL SERVICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8438) making appropriations for the Navy Department and the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue for 3 hours, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] and myself, and that at the conclusion of that debate the Clerk shall read the first paragraph of the bill and the Committee shall rise.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8438, with Mr. BLAND in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the naval appropriation bill as submitted to the Appropriations Committee in accordance with the recommendations of the President's Budget called for $1,078,472,577.

The bill before the House as reported by the subcommittee on naval appropriations carries $966,772,878, being a reduction under Budget estimates of $111,699,699.

The Committee should understand that while there is a reduction of $111,699,699, yet nevertheless by the language of the bill making immediately available $50,000,000 for ship construction from the 1941 Budget to take care of work under the 1940 Budget there will be an immediate deficit of $50,000,000 in the fiscal year 1941.

In addition to the deficit of $50,000,000 there has been a reduction of $25,000,000 in the appropriation bill to carry on the ship construction which is under way, which will bring about a further deficit of approximately $25,000,000.

So the House should understand that there will be a deficit of approximately $75,000,000 for ship construction to be dealt with at the first session of the Seventy-seventh Congress.

There is sufficient money appropriated in the bill now under consideration to carry on ship construction until about April 1941.

If there is no deficiency appropriation in the Seventy-seventh Congress, the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1942, which will be considered during the calendar year 1941, will have to make immediately available $75,000,000 or else the ship-construction program must stop.

I have broken down the naval appropriation bill and analyzed the reduction in each bureau, which is as follows:

Naval appropriation bill, 1941

The estimates which were before the committee totaled	$1,078,472,577
The bill as reported carries	966,772,878
The total reduction therefore is	111,699,699

The major reductions are as follows:

Secretary's office	$59,525
Eliminating administrative promotion money, eliminating 19, of which 13 employees in Personnel Division (Plozet's office), $45,990; printing and binding, $65,000; miscellaneous expenses, $193,495; increase in Naval Research Laboratory of $249,220. There is nothing of great consequence in the foregoing.
Bureau of Navigation	234,765
The only two major changes being a reduction in welfare and recreation of $130,000, and an increase in Naval Reserve of $189,940. The Naval Reserve increase is to provide some training for volunteer Naval Reservists.
Engineering	6,531,140
$2,110,000 of this was for two fleet net layers. The remainder of the money is supposed to be a 10-percent general cut. In view of the fact that money for the boom tenders, $3,600,000, is still in the bill under the "B" budget, this is not as serious as it sounds, although the reduction of $3,708,120 in the "A" budget has to come out of yard and district craft, the material maintenance and improvement plan, or special repair items.
Construction and repair	5,415,300
Here again, $1,800,000 of this is for two fleet net layers. The rest of the cut is presumed to be a 10-percent cut against the "A" budget total. Here also is $4,400,000 still in the "B" budget for the boom tenders. The cut in the "A" budget will have to come out of the same items mentioned under "Engineering."
Ordnance and ordnance stores	26,877,212
Of which $21,971,140 is the net project. The remainder of the cut, $4,905,952, is against aviation ordnance.
Pay, subsistence, and transportation	9,487,722
Comprised of the following:
Reduced number of enlisted men going into Naval Reserve (16- and 20-year men)	$1,000,000
Reduced ration cost, 2 cents	1,013,450
Reducing pay for retired officers to include only those now on active duty	2,052,500
Reducing enlisted strength 2,000, from 152,000 to 150,000	1,806,316
Changing percentage distribution by pay grades	1,615,456
General reduction	2,000,000
	9,487,722
Clothing and small stores fund	2,000,000
$4,000,000 was requested.
Medical Department:
No reductions of consequence under medicine and surgery.
Yards and docks:
No reductions under yards and docks except public works.
Public works	8,596,525
The projects which the committee allowed are listed on page 10 of the report. Harbor works at Guam were allowed.
Aviation, Navy	21,714,600
In addition to this cut the contract authorization was reduced from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000. What the committee states on page 5 of the report is that the Naval Air Service is ahead of the strength contemplated under the act of 1938, which contemplated 3,000 planes by 1944. Therefore the committee has reduced the amount requested for expansion planes to $2,000,000, which is to be expended for the purchase of prototypes and other experimental craft, including those to be powered by Diesel engines. It has allowed 305 replacement planes (297 for Navy and 8 for Naval Reserve), which was the amount requested, and has allowed as to expansion planes the 47 for the Naval Reserve, but disallowed the 224 requested for the Navy. The general effect of the foregoing is to add $2,000,000 to experimental funds and cut out the regular expansion aircraft of the Navy. More serious than this, the $10,000,000 contract authorization applies to that extent against $29,884,400 of replacement planes, so that even $10,000,000 of replacement plans will have to be paid for next year.
Marine Corps:
Cuts negligible.

Replacement of naval vessels:
Construction and machinery		$24,928,021
Armor, armament, and ammunition		3,700,000
These cuts were made by merely deferring into a deficiency bill for 1941 certain charges. The statement of the committee is as follows:
Reduce estimate for two 1940 battleships	$9,335,500
Reduce estimate for two 1940 cruisers	3,520,000
Reduce estimate for two 1941 battleships	6,000,000
Reduce estimate for two 1941 cruisers	1,150,000
Reduce amount of estimate for work on ships commissioned prior to July 1, 1939	4,922,521
		24,928,021
Similar reductions under "Armor, armament, and ammunition" total $3,700,000. What the committee says is that funds have been left in the bill to work up plans for two new capital ships, intimating that some other design than 45,000-ton ships should be adopted. The same applies to the cruisers. In the case of the 1940 ships the intimation is that plans of these ships should be changed to incorporate more speed, armor, and armament; in other words, more tonnage. Language of the bill permits laying down all of the vessels which we asked for.
Alterations to naval vessels		2,000,000
Flat cut because the report says the Saratoga and Lexington will not be available for yard overhaul before Jan. 1, 1941. I believe engineering furnished the committee the information for this cut.

I realize fully the earnest desire of the subcommittee to take care of the Navy's needs and not to cripple the first line of the national defense and at the same time being confronted with the condition of the Government's finances, the problem of increased taxes, and the approach to the statutory debt limit.

I can fully appreciate the difficulties confronting the committee; therefore, I shall support the measure as presented by the committee; however, I hope that some of the severe cuts, such as the flat 10-percent reduction in engineering and construction and repair amounting to some $6,000,000 for the general upkeep of the forces afloat, and also the reduction of aviation and the procurement of planes, and particularly the contract authorization for the purchase of planes for the aircraft carrier Hornet which will soon be completed can be adjusted before the bill finally becomes law.

In view of the fact that much has been said in the papers and the comments in the committee's report in regard to larger battleships, I desire to make some observations on that subject.

I am thoroughly in accord with the desire of the chairman and the subcommittee that this Government shall construct ships superior to those of any other nation and that our shipbuilding program should not be confined to imitation of other nations. In other words, this Nation should build the type and character of ships its defenses require irrespective of what other nations build.

In my opinion, the American Navy, both in material and personnel, is unsurpassed by any other nation. There can be no doubt that we exceed all other nations as far as naval aviation is concerned, and this has been accomplished due to the fact that naval aviation has remained a part and parcel of the Navy and there has never been established a separate air corps.

I am not one of those who believe that we should launch upon a program of building 75,000-ton battleships.

I have been a member of the Naval Affairs Committee for 23 years. During that time I have become familiar with a great many phases of naval activities and naval problems. But when it comes to all of the factors of naval strategy and naval tactics and the conflicting considerations which dictate the characteristics that are to be embodied in building ships, I have found that the only safe course is to depend on the best advice that can be obtained, and that is from the experienced naval officers in positions of responsibility who are our naval experts.

I have found no responsible naval officer who advocates jumping at this time to a battleship of 75,000 tons. So far as I have learned, they unanimously support the laying down at the present time of the 45,000-ton battleships. These officers include the naval designers, the members of the general board, the present Chief of Naval Operations, and his predecessor and the last commander in chief of the fleet. This action of adhering for the present to the 45,000-ton design is urged not only by the naval designers responsible for the building of the ships but by the military men responsible for fighting them, and fighting them successfully.

Shipbuilding is at once a science and an art. As an art, a ship of new design represents a development from ships that have been built and proved before. As a highly important consideration, therefore, it is undesirable from the point of view of actual construction to increase the size of ships as compared to existing ships by too large an increase. We have now under construction battleships approximately one-third larger than existing ships.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, would it interrupt the gentleman to yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Not at all.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman advise us as to whether there is any relationship between speed and size?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In the construction of a ship you have to take into consideration speed and size, and oftentimes you have to determine to which you will give superiority. It is sometimes impossible to have all the speed and all the armor in the same ship.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. What I am trying to find out is whether you can get as much speed in a little ship.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I am coming to that in a moment.

The present tonnage of the largest battleship in the United States Navy is 35,000 tons. The appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1940 provided for the laying down of two battleships and it is contemplated that their tonnage will be 45,000 tons. The plans for these two ships have been practically completed.

To undertake the construction of a ship more than double the size of existing ships—such as a 75,000-ton ship—would be, under the circumstances, extremely unwise unless there were very compelling reasons for doing so. Such reasons do not exist at the present time.

There are other complications with reference to the construction of 75,000-ton ships:

First. The limitations of the Panama Canal locks;

Second. Channels into the harbors throughout the country;

Third. Room in the harbors; and Fourth. Drydocks.

The Panama Canal will not take a 75,000-ton battleship. The new locks when completed will be approximately 1,200 feet long and 140 to 150 feet wide. Such locks could take a 75,000-ton ship, but the contemplated new locks will not be finished until 1946, while it is anticipated to finish the 45,000-ton ships within the next 4 years.

There is not a single drydock in the United States or in Hawaii large enough to accommodate 75,000-ton battleships.

Harbor facilities as they exist today, without considerable overhauling, are inadequate for the movability of 75,000-ton battleships. As to the channels, some of our important entrance channels are traversed with difficulty by ships of the size of the Lexington and Saratoga, and they are only 33,000 tons.

I repeat, none of our drydocks, either east coast, west coast, or Hawaii, is sufficiently large to dock a 75,000-ton ship. It is true that new and bigger docks can be built, present docks can be enlarged, harbors deepened, and new and larger canal locks are in prospect. But all of this will require time and money—much money. The time that is to elapse, or would elapse, before the essential facilities can be provided is uncertain. Would we then build an uncertain ship whose employment would be not only uncertain but doubtful because of uncertain or nonexistent locking, docking, and harbor facilities?

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. What is the present capacity of our largest dock?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. It is only large enough to take care of 35,000-ton ships.

Mr. TERRY. Then the present drydocks cannot take care of the 45,000-ton ships?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. They can take care of them with the additions provided for in the bill reported out of the Naval Affairs Committee on yesterday.

Mr. TERRY. Is there any demand for 75,000-ton ships?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There has been a good deal of agitation in the country and a good deal of talk about 75,000-ton battleships.

Mr. TERRY. But there is nothing in this bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. There is nothing in this bill about 75,000-ton battleships. We are committed to 45,000-ton battleships, and it is to be hoped that these 45,000-ton battleships will be taken care of in this bill.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The same thing the gentleman has said with reference to a 75,000-ton ship would apply to a 55,000-ton ship or a 65,000-ton ship?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Exactly; and may I say that the idea of these 75,000-ton ships originated in the mind of some designers in New York who drafted a 60,000-ton battleship which was sent to Russia, and I do not know what ever became of it. The firm of Gibbs & Cox drew the design for a 60,000-ton battleship, but what we want here is a 45,000-ton battleship, which has been recommended by this committee and which I hope the House will go along with and put in the bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I do not know that the gentleman has specifically so stated, but I think it is clear that the 45,000-ton battleships can go through the Panama Canal's present locks, and, therefore, they are not in excess of the size that can be used.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Does the gentleman say that the 45,000-ton ships will be able to use the present locks?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. They will; yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. And the present drydocks?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. And the present channels?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is right, exactly. There is this involved in the matter. We may be compelled to spend on the navy yards some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 in expansion to carry on the building as rapidly as we want to do it, but they can build, and are making preparations to build, two 45,000-ton battleships now. The plans have already been perfected and this bill calls for two additional ones.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Inquiry was made a moment ago as to whether there was demand for 75,000-ton battleships; is it not the implication of the report here from the Committee on Appriations that the 45,000-ton battleship is not big enough or that the ones now under construction are not modern enough?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That inference could be drawn from the committee report and that is the reason I said at the beginning of my remarks, "in view of those comments."

Mr. MOTT. And that is an answer to the question of whether there is a demand for such large battleships.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield me 5 or 10 minutes more?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Notwithstanding the difficulties presented by nonexisting locking, docking, and harbor facilities it is of primary consideration that our naval experts, to the last man, are opposed to these superbattleships.

Not a single designer, not a single naval expert in the Navy Department is in favor of going over for the time being the authorization of these 45,000-ton battleships.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. We are going to stand by the gentleman on these big battleships, but we ordinary folks would like a little information. Do we have to get an awful big battleship to carry a gun that is equal in range to these big guns we hear about? What is the use of having big battleships, when one of these big bombs will perhaps blow it out of the water?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The 45,000-ton battleships would have the same speed, the same armor, the same sized gun, that is the 16-inch gun, as the 75,000-ton battleship, and the 45,000-ton battleship costs $90,000,000, while the 75,000-ton battleship costs $140,000,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. TABER. The better ones of our 35,000-ton battleships now have 16-inch guns.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Exactly.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Is the gentleman going to discuss the development in bombing technique?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No.

Mr. MILLER. Will these 45,000-ton ships be any better protected than the ships of the last few years?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Oh, everyone knows that probably under certain conditions torpedoes can sink a battleship, and you might put enough bombs on a battleship possibly to sink it, but, as far as human ingenuity is concerned, it is the most durable of all ships and the most durable of all weapons.

Mr. MILLER. I do not think the chairman got the question. Is the development in defense—that is, defense from air attack—improving as rapidly as bombing technique?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Every battleship carries the latest antiaircraft guns it is possible to provide.

Battleship superiority can be attained either by a superiority of ship for ship, by a superiority of numbers, or by a combination of these two. I am far from being in disagreement with those who advocate that we should lead, and not follow, the world in the development of our ship types. This should be true of the United States beyond any other nation, particularly in the matter of battleships. Designs for larger battleships up to a certain point undoubtedly provide a desirable step in this direction.

In the meantime, the 45,000-ton battleships that we are building have the same size guns and have approximately the same protection and speed. They are ships which would not be outmoded even by the proposed superbattleships, provided always that we have a sufficient number of the 45,000-ton ships.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Will not the same argument apply to building 20,000-ton cruisers as opposed to the battleships?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No. Because the 20,000-ton cruiser cannot stand up against a battleship, even of 35,000 tons.

Looking at it from another angle, the cost per battleship-ton is about the same, irrespective of size. That being so, then for the cost of two 75,000-ton ships we could just about build four 45,000-ton ships. Having about the same speed, armor, and armament, it is self-evident that four ships would be superior to the two. Visualize them opposed in battle—the four smaller ships would have the advantage of larger targets, concentration of fire, and preponderance of armament. The larger ships would have more and smaller targets to cover, which would materially reduce their effectiveness.

Then again—suppose a ship on each side was disabled—the larger ships would lose half their strength while the smaller ones would lose only one-fourth.

To sum up, the naval experts are of the opinion that at this time we should not embark upon a program of constructing 75,000-ton battleships, and I am thoroughly in accord with their stand.

In the interest of economy we should adhere to the naval experts' program to lay down and build simultaneously the four 45,000-ton battleships.

By doing so millions upon millions of dollars can be saved because these ships will be sister ships, all of the same design and, it is contemplated that two of them will be built in industrial yards and two of them in navy yards.

The cost to construct a 75,000-ton ship is approximately $120,000,000 to $130,000,000 and to build a 45,000-ton ship as the Navy desires will cost approximately eighty-five or ninety million dollars.

While we all recognize the fact that war is going on in Asia and Europe and this country must look to its defenses, nevertheless in approaching these naval matters we should do so with no hysteria.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN. I did not want to interrupt the gentleman, but at the outset of his speech he stated without reservation, as I understood, that on April 1, 1941, there would be a deficit, and pointed out the necessity for a deficiency appropriation.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Mr. COCHRAN. If that occurs, will that not be a direct violation, of the statute which requires the spending agencies to spread their appropriations over a 12-month period?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. No; the gentleman is mistaken, because the bill makes available now $50,000,000 of the 1941 money. This money is being appropriated to run the Navy from July to July. In this bill we permit the Navy Department to use $5,000,000 of the money which we are going to appropriate. In other words, we are $50,000,000 short right now.

Next year you have to take care of that $50,000,000 either by a deficit appropriation or making the money available in the appropriation bill of 1941 immediately available. I say that is not the way to legislate. What we should do is to appropriate money from July to July; but I recognize the fact of what we are all up against, and I certainly find myself in accord with this bill and it will have my hearty support. The committee is to be congratulated, being confronted with the difficulties which they are, on the magnificent bill they have presented here. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a few observations suggested by the mysterious paralysis which seems to have afflicted the administration and the Congress in dealing with the question of a loan to Finland.

Against the prevailing world-wide social and economic uncertainty, the clash of irreconciliable ideologies, the waste and suffering of war, the well-nigh universal moral collapse and consequent intellectual confusion, two questions confront the American people like flames of lightning against a stormy sky.

No successful denial or evasion of these questions is possible. They must be answered in American terms by an enlightened and united American public opinion if our fundamental American plan of life is to be preserved and civilization itself saved from chaos.

First. What kind of a world are we and our children going to live in after this present universal black-out of reason, justice, and humanity is lifted?

Second. What kind of a country are we and our children going to live in from now on?

The final answer to the first of these questions will determine in large measure the answer to the second.

If the world becomes a charnel house of moral, mental, and material slavery enforced by fear, hate, and armed force, and putrid with the stench of dead rights and liberties, how can America hope to escape the universal infection? If the world is able, as a result of its present travail, to establish a new civilization upon the unshakable foundations of moral and spiritual unity, economic cooperation, political, social, and personal freedom, would that not impart to our American institutions a new vigor and inspire our people with a new vision in the art of living?

The feeble and faltering attitude of our Government and people toward the first of these questions, we like in moments of mental and moral relaxation to call our foreign policy.

It is this alleged foreign policy—this conglomeration of contradictions and expediencies—which I desire to explore briefly at this time. I do this not with any sanguine expectation of effecting immediate changes in our present policy or practice, but in order to relieve my own mind by sharing with my colleagues certain disturbing and depressing reflections upon the general situation, and in particular upon the question of our Government's proposed aid to the heroic and freedom-loving people of Finland in their hour of desperate need.

It is hard for us to obtain a clear picture of the present period of fundamental transition in world affairs and its inevitable effects upon our own American economy, because of certain mutually antagonistic psychological forces at work among our people.

Following the illustrious example of the New Deal's high command, we seem to be moving at varying rates of speed in several opposite directions at once. We do not know where we are going, but we are on the way.

The American people, greatly to their credit, have reached a settled conviction on one or two central principles from which there may be evolved, in time, a rational approach to the vital problems which remain to be solved if civilization is to endure.

Our people are practically unanimous in their abhorrence and renunciation of war as a method of settling international disputes. They are equally fixed in their belief that peace is the only sound foundation for a free, progressive, and permanent democratic world civilization.

Apart from, and perhaps because of these commendable expressions of public opinion, our governmental attitude toward present world problems, and especially toward the question of a Government loan or gift to Finland, is evasive, hesitant, and timorous. This attitude may be a reflection of the peculiar psychological crisis, to which I referred a moment ago, in which the American people find themselves involved.

The moral judgment of the American people on this question is absolutely sound. As President Roosevelt recently said, at least 98 percent of our people are in favor of Finland. They are in favor of Finland and against Russia because they love liberty and hate tyranny. They know that Finland is right and Russia is wrong. They know that Finland represents every ideal and principle of freedom, integrity, and justice which has made America great. They know that if the Russian monster destroys Finland it will mean to that extent the weakening in the world of everything we in America hold sacred—religion, humanity, justice, and freedom. Every normal American is in complete moral revolt against the hatred, fear, cruelty, greed, and brutality now threatening to destroy the world.

But as yet the American people, and equally their Government, are confused and uncertain as to the choice of means for implementing the authority of their moral sense in these international affairs. The reason for this intellectual uncertainty and confusion is clear.

For 150 years our people and Government were engaged in developing a vast new continent; in building up a complicated economic structure; in creating and testing systems of government and law; in fostering social institutions for highest service to the individual. Our backs were toward the outer world. We faced in upon ourselves. We were nurtured in the faith that we could remain forever safely insulated from the political and social changes and chances incessantly developing throughout the rest of the world.

These conditions of safe and satisfying parochialism are now "gone with the wind." America has become the richest and most powerful nation in the world. And we are now faced with the duty of discharging the moral obligations which inhere in the possession of this wealth and power. From this moral obligation there is no honorable way of escape.

We are now not only a world power—we are, in respect of resources, the leading world power. And we do not quite know how best to behave in this new and unaccustomed but inevitable role. We are like a colt being broke to the plow; we cannot as yet keep our shoulder firm against the collar and our feet in the furrow. We are thoroughly familiar with our own numerous forms of home-grown political and economic skulduggery. But as yet we do not feel entirely sure of ourselves when we get out in the big world of devious diplomacy. We shall probably have to serve a generation or two of diplomatic apprenticeship before this absurd and unnecessary inferiority complex in dealing with world affairs is finally sloughed off.

Meanwhile let us take a square look at this question of our making a Government loan or gift to Finland in its hour of desperate need. Such a straight loan or gift is in accord with the moral sense and expressed desire of a majority of our people. Yet here we are, the most powerful government in the world, headed by the greatest administration since 1933 [laughter], behaving on this question of a loan to Finland like an elephant afraid of a mouse. It is on a par with the timorous gentleman who was chased under the bed by his irate wife wielding a broomstick. After a while he ventured to peek out. Said she, "Don't you dare peek," and he replied, "As long as I have the spirit of a man in me I will peek." [Laughter.]

Our whole governmental handling of this problem up to the present is enveloped in a fog of evasiveness and timidity. First of all, President Roosevelt sends a message to Congress on the subject couched in such terms of sweetness and light as to cause one to wonder if it could have come from the same iron-handed leader who used to send "must" legislation to the Congress.

Then appeared a bill which merely confirmed the right, already existing, of the Finnish Government to sell bonds to private American investors.

Next came a barrage of solemn oratory leveled against our doing anything for Finland because it might "involve us in the present war." And this in complete indifference to the fact that we are already involved in the present war up to our necks.

Our entire fiscal structure is involved in the prodigious war financing of England and France in this country, and by the possibility of their dumping some three billions of securities upon our already sick market.

Our foreign trade is involved by the expansion of allied exports to the rest of the world to pay their war bills.

Our warehouses, stuffed with unsold and unsaleable tobacco and cotton, are involved. Our idle ships and idle sailors are involved.

Our prodigious increase in cost of war preparation for defense is involved.

Our sale of millions' worth of war material to our friends the Japanese, to be used by them in killing our friends the Chinese, is involved.

Our loans and sales of material to our friends the Chinese, to be used in killing our friends the Japanese, is involved.

Our purchase of gold at this time from the Russians at a high profit to them is involved.

We are involved by the not highly creditable fact that Russia owes us hundreds of millions which she can use to destroy Finland, while Finland has paid all but a fraction of her debt to us, which money we now hesitate to reloan to her except upon impossible terms.

And now, as the crowning absurdity, we have before our Banking and Currency Committee a bill to increase the capital of the Import Bank by $100,000,000—with the implication that perhaps a small portion of this fund may be loaned to Finland, provided it is all spent here for nonmilitary supplies, such as powder puffs and carpet slippers. [Applause and laughter.] And provided further that the Russians are not unduly annoyed by our generous and chivalrous action. The final destination of the balance of this fund to the Import Bank is still shrouded in mystery.

Finland is putting up the most heroic battle ever fought in modern times in defense of world freedom. She needs guns and ammunition and airplanes to protect her women and children and sick and wounded from slaughter by the Russians, and her fighting men from final destruction.

Knowing the membership of this House as I do, I dare to hope that here we shall end this tragic farce and proceed to enact legislation in the real interest of our Finnish brethren, and worthy of a great freedom-loving people who are not afraid to stand for right and discharge their duty as free men.

Through the long years I have held tenaciously to the conviction that next to His divine kingdom the United States of American has been God's best gift of opportunity to the common man. With the wonderful, generous, and spontaneous outpourings of private help by the American people to the stricken peoples of the world, I cannot believe that this House will permit our Government to assume an attitude of penurious timidity toward the immortal Finns. I want my country to embody in every official act the true genius of its citizenship and the glory of its heroic past.

I, for one, am ashamed of this straddling, evasive Import Bank bill. If we do not want, as a Government, to help Finland, let us say so and state why. If we do want to help Finland, let us do it in a straightforward manner worthy of a great and free nation.

The real America which we represent in this body and the position we desire our country to take before the world is best envisioned by John Milton in his immortal essay on the Freedom of the Press 300 years ago:

> Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep and shaking her invincible locks; methinks I see her as an eagle mewing her mighty youth and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam, purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance, while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about amazed at what she means.

That is my idea of America, and I cannot conceive of such an America shilly-shallying and logic-chopping the way we are doing when Finland needs the money, and by every dictate of humanity ought to have it. [Applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. I was very pleased to listen to the gentleman's talk about Finland. I would just like to ask the gentleman has he any idea of introducing an amendment to the bill that passed the Senate with reference to Finland, with regard to how this $20,000,000 should be loaned and the restrictions upon the $20,000,000?

Mr. EATON. I was hoping that when it came before the House the chairman of our Foreign Affairs Committee would have the nerve to do that very thing. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EATON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. It just happens that the bill about which the gentleman is speaking is not before the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. EATON. That is a misfortune.

Mr. BLOOM. I am serious about this, and I would like to have the gentleman be serious for a moment, and if he would like to answer the question I would be very pleased to have him do so. The bill is before the Committee on Banking and Currency. I understand the chairman of that committee introduced yesterday a special resolution which is practically the same as the Senate bill that was reported here. Now, the gentleman made a very nice appeal and I would like to go along with the gentleman, but as long as it is his original idea and he spoke upon that today, will the gentleman promise to introduce such an amendment when the bill is before the House for consideration?

Mr. EATON. I would promise to do anything that would relieve the gentleman's mind. I would be glad to. [Laughter and applause.] I would think that such an amendment would have a better chance of passing if it came from the majority side of the House. That is where it should come from.

Mr. BLOOM. Would the gentleman yield further or would he prefer not to answer my question?

Mr. EATON. I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. BLOOM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. He has not. The gentleman has evaded the question. The gentleman has made a statement with reference to a loan to Finland. He has attacked the Government and has attacked this administration. I would like to know, if the gentleman is sincere—and I know that he is—whether he will offer an amendment to the bill embodying the suggestion that he made in his speech this afternoon?

Mr. EATON. I will answer that by asking the gentleman a question. Will the gentleman support such an amendment if I offer it?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes; I will support it, providing it does not infringe on our present Neutrality Act.

Mr. EATON. Good. Then I will do it, and the gentleman and I will get together to do something really worth while for Finland. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I want to ask the gentleman a question along the same line as that which the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee just propounded. Here is a bill, as I understand it, which simply increases the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. It makes that addition to the present statute, and puts a proviso in there that the directors of the Export-Import Bank shall not make a new loan to any country or its nationals or its agencies in excess of $20,000,000; and that if that loan is made, the money so loaned shall not be spent for arms, ammunition, and implements of war, if the President proclaims that Sweden, for instance, is a belligerent and brings it within the classification. I am wondering what kind of an amendment could be made to that bill which would be germane, which will accommodate the situation insofar as our desire to help Finland is concerned. I think that is something that might be given consideration in the meantime.

I want to ask the gentleman this question: As this bill is now presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency, does the gentleman understand that there is anything in it which prevents the Export-Import Bank from making a loan of $20,000,000 to Finland, which adds to the $10,000,000 they have already borrowed, and then let Finland use that $20,000,000 any way it pleases, in the absence of the President's proclamation that Finland is a belligerent and that there is a state of war?

Mr. EATON. The bill itself, as I read it, provides that the money must be spent for nonwar materials.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not so understand the bill. As I understand the bill——

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman will yield, I will try to answer that question.

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The way I understand it, that $20,000,000, or any amount of the money loaned to any government according to the rules of the Export-Import Bank, must be expended in this country. All of the money must be spent here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes.

Mr. BLOOM. And it cannot be spent for any war materials. That has nothing to do with any proclamation issued by the President, because there is no declaration today stating that war exists between Finland and Soviet Russia.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is what I mean.

Mr. EATON. The language of the Senate bill reads:

That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law—

Although we have abandoned international law entirely—as interpreted by the Department of State, or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do I understand, then, the gentleman to say that the President has listed as "arms, ammunition, and implements of war," to which list the Export-Import Bank must refer and stand upon in connection with the $20,000,000 loan that it may or may not make to Finland? Has the die been cast? Can Finland use any part of this $20,000,000 to buy arms, ammunition, and implements of war if the President does not further act?

Mr. EATON. Not under the terms of this bill. He has already acted.

Mr. CRAWFORD. He has already acted?

Mr. EATON. Yes. And the provisions of this Senate bill as drawn make action mandatory in accordance with the President's action.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman will yield.

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. BLOOM. The President has acted by his proclamation. Under the provisions of this bill this money can only be expended for such merchandise as is not excluded under the 1939 Neutrality Act; and under the rules of the Export-Import Bank it must be spent in this country. To my way of thinking we cannot specifically mention Finland in this legislation.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If I may reply to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. EATON. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, cannot the gentleman from Vermont yield these gentlemen som more time?

Mr. PLUMLEY. I regret that I cannot. I have too many requests for time.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this discussion, not being germane to the pending bill, is out of order.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BLAND). This is general debate on an appropriation bill. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I was very much interested in the observation made by the distinguished chairman of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, with reference to the provision in this resolution that passed the Senate placing a limitation upon the expenditure of this money; but can the gentleman from New York, the gentleman from New Jersey, or anyone else, point to anything in the law today that prevents the Export-Import Bank from making these loans without any restriction as to the character of purchases to be made with the money now available?

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. After having made purchases in this country they could barter those goods with Italy, for instance, and Italy could ship them the military equipment.

Mr. BLOOM. Certainly, that can be done.

Mr. GIFFORD. That is an indirect way, to be sure, of enabling them to get what they need in the way of military supplies.

Mr. EATON. It is indirect, and it is an utterly unworthy way for this Nation to behave.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman is right.

Mr. EATON. It is not the way in which a great nation should act.

Mr. BLOOM. I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. I may say to the gentleman from New Jersey that while these gentlemen are drawing fine distinctions in respect of the loan to Finland, as a matter of fact we are furnishing the bombing planes that are being used so ruthlessly today behind the lines to kill civilians and that are disemboweling women and children—450 planes. What is the use of fiddling around with all this hypocrisy?

Mr. EATON. Yes; that is my contention.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON. I yield.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. I agree with what the gentleman from New York says. Not only are we furnishing the planes, but also the high-test gasoline to run them.

Mr. REED of New York. Let us not be deceived; let us open our eyes to the facts. I have them here. The gentleman from New Jersey has made a wonderful speech. We need more speeches of the same character to shed the light of day on what is happening. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

THE ECONOMY TONIC AND ITS EFFECT ON THE COUNTRY

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, the best tonic America has had in 10 years of depression is the economy tonic that is now being administered by the Congress in its action on the appropriation measures that are being brought forward at the present session. The heavy cuts in appropriations are like the elixir of life to business and industry. Business is being invigorated and rejuvenated by the news that is coming these days out of Washington. The businessman is awakening to the pleasing realization that after all he is not "the forgotten man" and that there are those in Washington who really care for him. Industry is taking hope and encouragement from the signs that the era of excessive spending, which has thrown the Budget wildly out of balance, is drawing to an end.

As evidences multiply that the economy wave which has struck Congress is not a mere evanescent dream, but a real start toward a balanced Budget, businessmen and manufacturers are getting a grip on themselves and are allowing their newly found faith in the future to furnish inspiration for recuperative action which, if given continued encouragement at this Capital, will open the way for a real recovery in this country.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Speaking of retrenchment in expenditures—and I take it that the gentleman is in favor of the program of retrenchment?

Mr. LUDLOW. I certainly am.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I wonder if my distinguished colleague from Indiana is in favor of reducing expenditures in all other branches as the Appropriations Committee did for the farmers by cutting their expenditures about 52 percent? Is the gentleman willing to treat all other departments as the farmers were treated?

Mr. LUDLOW. I may say to the gentleman that I am willing to cut just as deeply in all departments as can be done without injurying vital operations of the Government. I think we ought to cut a lot of these bills.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Will the gentleman say that a reduction of 52 percent did not injure agriculture and the 23,000,000 people dependent upon agriculture for a living?

Mr. LUDLOW. The farmer has to depend on people in the city to buy his produce, and those people in the city living on meager hand-outs from township authorities have no money with which to create a market. Therefore I say that a policy of retrenchment, which is absolutely necessary to give employment and buying power to the city millions, who comprise the vast majority of our population, is in the long run conducive to the prosperity of our farmers. In fact, I think it is essential to the prosperity of those who till the soil as well as those who work in the factories. I think a program of reasonable and sensible reduction is just as much in the farmers' favor as in favor of the other people.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I agree with the gentleman, but does he think the farmer ought to be cut 52 percent when no other department in the Government approaches that kind of a cut?

Mr. LUDLOW. I think we might take into consideration whether the appropriations for the farmers last year, and in recent years, have not been extra liberal, and whether or not he is being unduly penalized. I do not know whether the gentleman is correct in his percentage or not. I think his percentage is too high, especially since a large part of the cut in the agricultural estimates that was made in committee has been restored by the House.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. The farmer has never received more than 75 percent of parity with industry and labor.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman realizes we have increased the agricultural appropriations in the last 10 years over 1,200 percent?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has stated more succinctly and clearly what was in my mind than I was able to say it myself. If the gentleman from Missouri will look at the agricultural appropriation bills during the last 10 years he will be satisfied that the farmer has been rather generously dealt with.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. If we believe what we preach, that agriculture ought to be placed on a parity with labor and industry, surely the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not argue that agriculture ought to be content with 75 percent of what industry, the business in which the gentleman is engaged, and labor are receiving.

Mr. RICH. May I say to the gentleman that I have never received one penny out of the Government—I hope I have not—directly or indirectly, as a manufacturer. But when the Department of Agriculture has received an increase of 1,200 percent in 10 years, that is a great increase. The only thing that some Members of this Congress can see is what they are directly interested in. They do not look at the picture as a whole, as the gentleman from Indiana, who is trying to do an honest-to-goodness job here in the Congress. There is not a man doing any more than the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] in that respect, and I admire him for his attitude. When Members can see but one particular thing that is going to get them votes, then they are not as big as the gentleman from Indiana, who looks at the thing broadly and from all angles. [Applause.]

Mr. O'NEAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky, who is one of the most valuable members of the Appropriations Committee and one of the ablest Representatives who ever served in this Congress.

Mr. O'NEAL. The gentleman from Missouri asked the gentleman from Indiana whether he would be as ardent for economy along other lines. As a member of the Appropriations Committee and serving on the subcommittee of which the chairman is the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], may I say that there has not been a man in the House who has been more unselfish, more intelligent, and more ardent with reference to appropriations and I feel there is not an appropriation that comes before this House that ought to be cut or that comes within the purview of his own subcommittee, on which the gentleman from Indiana would not use the pruning knife vigorously if it should be used. [Applause.]

Mr. LUDLOW. I want to thank my friend the gentleman from Kentucky from the bottom of my heart for his generous reference to me. As he has truthfully said, I believe that a general application of the pruning knife to all activities is essential to the national welfare.

Mr. ENGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. ENGEL. May I say that I agree with all that the gentleman from Kentucky has said.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I want to join in these expressions of admiration for the distinguished doctor, and I am very sincere about that; but I am wondering if it is the gentleman's philosophy, and if he wishes to be understood as taking the position, that because the farmer has been discriminated against by a high-protective tariff that industry, such as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH] represents, has been the beneficiary of, agriculture ought to be content with that for the balance of the history of this country?

Mr. LUDLOW. May I say to the gentleman, I do not want to be led into a tariff discussion. I was born on a farm in a log cabin, and I do not say that for political purposes. I know from experience the hardships of pioneer life and if I had time I would like to pay a loving tribute to the farmers, because I am bone of their bone and flesh of their flesh. My sympathies are wholeheartedly, sincerely, with the farm people of this country, but I believe that in order to have recovery in this country that will amount to anything we have to vitalize the whole structure, not one part of it. If you examine the appropriations for the farmers, you will find they have not been discriminated against. They have been most generously dealt with by this Congress.

Mr. MASSINGALE. For 150 years they have been dealt with generously, in the opinion of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. LUDLOW. I am not covering quite as much territory as the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I want to cover all of it.

Mr. LUDLOW. At least ever since the administration of Franklin D. Roosevelt came into power, certainly the farmers have been most generously dealt with and I do not see how anyone could contend to the contrary.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I agree with the gentleman on the fact that with the coming of the Roosevelt administration there have been some favors extended the farmers that have heretofore been denied them; but industry has been more generously dealt with in the history of this Government than the farmers, even with what has been given them during the Roosevelt administration.

Mr. LUDLOW. When I think of the farmers' plight, I may say to the gentleman, I am thinking also of thousands and thousands of poor people in my city and in other cities throughout the country who are sitting in their homes without a fire and without anything to eat. Certainly as compared with the farmers, the farmer has the better end of the situation because he has the means of livelihood. In reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ZIMMERMAN] and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE], let me cite the Federal cash expenditures for agriculture since 1933. Those figures prove my point that the farmer has not been discriminated against. They are as follows:

1933	$79,500,000
1934	407,300,000
1935	945,800,000
1936	833,900,000
1937	919,300,000
1938	703,400,000
1939	1,213,400,000
1940 (estimated)	1,487,600,000
1941 (estimated)	1,002,000,000

These figures do not include any appropriations for roads, although the Bureau of Roads is under the Department of Agriculture. There is the picture. Does it indicate that the farmer has been neglected? When the expenditures out of the Federal Treasury for our farmers increase from $79,000,000 to over a billion dollars a year, can it be said that the farmer has been discriminated against? I have voted to help the farmer and I shall always do so. My heart bleeds for the poor and unfortunate farmer but I believe his situation is not quite as bad as the man in the city who has no job, no food in the house for himself and his family, and no fuel to keep them warm. As a rule, the farmer does not have these awful extreme conditions of suffering to face that exist in many cities of this country. God willing, I hope this Congress can do something for both the farmer and the city dweller, to lift both of them out of the fog of depression and suffering.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Does not the gentleman realize that according to the statisticians of the country the farmer is on the lowest rung of the economic ladder in the United States?

Mr. LUDLOW. Can the farmer be any lower than these multiplied thousands who just have no income at all?

Mr. MASSINGALE. If the gentleman will look at the statistics he will agree with me.

Mr. LUDLOW. Those people in the city have nothing to warm themselves with and nothing to eat. Is the farmer in a worse fix than they?

Mr. MASSINGALE. He is in a worse fix than they are, according to the statisticians and economists of the country.

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not care what the statisticians say, I say he is not in a worse fix, and not in nearly as bad a fix. I would like to do something to help both of them. I have studied the question a lot and I believe a policy of national economy will help both.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does the gentleman believe that it is for the good of this Nation for the farmer to produce food for the rest of the Nation at a loss?

Mr. LUDLOW. I do not think so.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Does not the gentleman believe that the farmer has been the goat in the entire relief picture in that he has been feeding at a loss the major portion of the population of the United States of America for the past 9 years? Is not the farmer at least entitled to a living price on his commodities consumed in this country? Can our great Nation prosper as long as the one basic industry, agriculture, does not have parity with industry?

Mr. LUDLOW. I will say to my friend that has all been thrashed out in answer to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. I agree with everything the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] has said. He is one of the real friends of agriculture in this House today.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the farmer has been relatively generously dealt with.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUDLOW. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Does the gentleman from Minnesota believe he will help the farmer by arraying the farmer against the worker in the city? Does he not believe it is better to aid both, and that the economic condition of one is dependent on the other?

Mr. LUDLOW. The gentleman from New York is absolutely right. We are all interdependent. We have to go up together or we go down together. No class of the people should be singled out for preferential treatment.

Business is champing the bit, eager to go ahead, and it will go ahead if Congress will continue along the economy course it has so well begun. I predict that Congress will so continue and that a few years from now we will be wondering where our sanity was when we appropriated in a single session of a peacetime Congress, the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, $497,742,081.54 more than the combined appropriations of all of the Congresses during the 20 years from 1890 to 1910, and we will look back with amazement on the fact that there was appropriated during that single session of a single Congress three times the amount that was appropriated from 1862 to 1866 to defray all of the expenses of the great Civil War.

Definitely a new philosophy is taking hold in Washington—a philosophy based on reason, a philosophy that will bring the country up on its feet, if along with it we will establish and faithfully maintain a policy of noninterference by Government in the legitimate affairs of business. To show how well we have started on an economy course it is only necessary to point out that every appropriation bill that has been brought in since the present session began on January 3 has been deeply cut below the Budget estimates. The bills that have been brought in and the cuts under budgetary estimates are as follows:

Emergency supplemental bill, $20,000,000.
Urgent deficiencies bill, $3,000,000.
Independent offices bill, $94,500,000.
Treasury and Post Office Departments bill, $11,500,000.
Agricultural appropriations bill, $154,500,000.
State, Justice, and Commerce appropriations bill, $2,500,000.
Navy appropriations bill, $111,700,000.

The total cut on all of these bills below the Budget as the bills were reported from the Appropriations Committee was $397,700,000. With eight regular supply bills and at least one deficiency to come, it seems perfectly reasonable to assume that it will be unnecessary to levy any new taxes, for, after making due allowance for the fact that some of the committee cuts will be restored in the House and Senate, there is still a heavy margin of probability that after all is said and done the total savings below the Budget will be in excess of $460,000,000—the amount the President estimated would have to be raised in new taxes if the Budget estimates were maintained unimpaired. Certainly no less than that may be expected of a Congress as economy-minded as the present one has turned out to be.

The important thing, however, is not the amount saved, but the fact that there has been a turn in the road from spending to economy. The thing that counts is that runaway spending apparently is over. That is tonic for business, tonic for industry, healthful, vitalizing tonic for the whole country. It is tonic for the farmer as well as the city man, for the farmer has no market for his products if the city folks cannot get employment and have no income except the starvation wages of relief labor and the miserable handouts of township trustees.

In this connection I want to commend the gentleman from Missouri, Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, chairman of the Agricultural Appropriations Subcommittee, for his vision and fine courage in bringing in the agricultural bill cut $154,500,000 below the Budget. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is a practical farmer who loves the soil. The farmers of America might search the country over with a fine-tooth comb and they would never find a better friend than the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]. Yet he had the strength and rectitude to stand up on this floor and battle for an economy which, while it would affect the farmer, would benefit the whole Nation, including the farmer, in the long run, and he did this because economy has become the symbol of national recovery. He has rendered his country a service of inestimable value.

Likewise, and in no less a measure, would I bestow my meed of praise on the gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, and his associates on the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee, who have brought in here the naval bill cut $111,700,000 below the Budget estimates. I plead with Members of the House to sustain these cuts and to hold up the arms of the gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, for he has done an excellent piece of work. It is not an easy nor a pleasant thing to deny appropriations to zealous individuals and to pressure groups, but there are times when it is the right thing to do; and when a fine public servant like the gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, stands up and unflinchingly does his duty, he is entitled to our support. The cuts which he and his subcommittee have made in the estimates, while deep, will not in any way jeopardize or impair our national defense, and the elimination of naval items that are not vital will spare some of our national resources for the distressed, the hungry, and naked, who should be the objects of our tender solicitude.

While I believe with all my heart in preparedness, and vote at all times for adequate national defense, I have not forgotten that we should also give some attention to the great human values and that, I am sure, is the belief of the gentleman from Nevada, Governor SCRUGHAM, and his associates. During the extreme subzero weather we have been having at Indianapolis, a constituent of mine wrote to me recently that he and his family were sitting in their little shack without fire. It would be hard to convince that man and his loved ones that we should spend $100,000,000 apiece for new battleships when people are starving and freezing, as they are now in many sections of this country. A well-fed, well-clothed, contented citizenry is a better defense preparation than unnecessary engines of war. If we can curb the international meddlers and hold this Nation true to the philosophy of Washington and Jefferson we are not going to have war, now or ever, but if we allow disease and poverty and all kinds of maladjustments to go unchecked we may have trouble at home, for there comes a point beyond which suffering cannot be endured and agony must find vent. The naval appropriations bill now before the House is a moderate bill, a sensible bill, a bill worthy of all confidence. It takes care of our national defense, but at the same time it recognizes that we have a problem at home—a great human problem—with hungry mouths to feed and naked bodies to clothe. By the very terms of its moderation it is a fit companion piece of the other appropriation measures that have gone before it at this session. It emphasizes once more that Congress is on the right track—the economy track—which if we have faith to adhere to it, will lead America out of the blackest night of depression in all of its history. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order that I may make some comment that will perhaps assist in keeping the record straight.

On February 7, 1940, there appeared in the Washington Post an article headed, "Mrs. Roosevelt Defends Communist Rights in Group." This article, by International News Service, stated in part—

> A White House debate in which Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt defended inclusion of Communists in the American Youth Congress was divulged yesterday on Capitol Hill.
> The First Lady told her guests at a White House conference Monday night that the youth organization was fighting for great principles in which Communists could share.
> A score of liberal Members of Congress took the opposite view. Mrs. Roosevelt called the conference in an effort to establish friendly relations between the Youth Congress and New Deal Congressmen.
> Miss Frances Williams, administrative chairman of the youth organization, launched the debate when she said, "representatives of 15,000 Communists are with us." She added that one known Communist is now serving on the legislative board of the Youth Congress. She defended their inclusion in the organization as justified by the Bill of Rights—declaring their exclusion would be a violation of the Constitution's guarantee of freedom of speech.

The article continued and quoted the remarks of two United States Senators and one Representative from this body who were in opposition to the position announced by Mrs. Roosevelt.

On that same day I called the attention of this House to that newspaper article and this conference, and I stated, as appears on page 1183 of the RECORD under date of February 7, quoting this article as I have quoted it today:

> There is the picture. These people came down here from New York after attending a meeting such as I have described and are invited to attend a meeting at the White House where the rights of these young Communists are applauded as being part and parcel, and rightfully part and parcel, of the American Youth Congress.

On the next day, February 8, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] arose, and his remarks are found on page 1233 of the RECORD. He said this:

> Mr. Speaker, I was amazed, chagrined, and embarrassed yesterday to find myself sitting as a Member of this body during criticism of the wife of the President. This attack was based upon a news story appearing in the morning paper. I could scarcely refrain from making an immediate reply, but it appeared to me that I might better serve the cause of good government and tolerance by refraining from comment until I could read the remarks of my colleague from Wisconsin. I sincerely hoped that when I saw his words in print they would seem less critical, and I am now pleased to find that it might have been the manner rather than the matter which so distressed me.

Then follows a long speech by my very dear friend from Oregon in which the implication is made that I am opposed to youth in this country and that in speaking as I did and in calling the attention of the Congress and the Nation to this meeting at the White House I was serving the cause of some organization or other that is opposed to youth.

Now, I want to say to my dear friend from Oregon that I am the father of three children and have raised two nephews and I have two grandchildren and am exceedingly interested in youth and he well knows it, and I do not want any inference to go out as a result of that long, prepared speech that the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, inserted in the RECORD that would cast any implication upon me as being opposed in any sense to youth. As a matter of fact, had the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, taken the time to read the RECORD, he would have discovered that I openly declared that I was in favor of the N. Y. A. as it is administered in my State of Wisconsin, and when I said that I meant it, and I said a great deal, judging from the criticism that has been directed at that organization in the last few days. Now, I am wondering, and I am speaking to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE], who is seated in front of me, was the gentleman chagrined when he read in the paper that the President was hissed on the White House grounds by this group that call themselves the American Youth Congress? I know that the gentleman must have been chagrined and mortified and embarrassed.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I refuse to yield at this time.

Was the gentleman chagrined when, here on the floor of the House and in this Chamber, representatives of this organization seated in the gallery hissed Members of this Congress?

Was the gentleman chagrined when he read the reports in the newspapers of the conduct of this organization when they threw out and ejected bodily two representative American youths who attended a meeting at the Labor Department Auditorium, and when they attempted to introduce resolutions condemning the aggression of Soviet Russia they were ejected and thrown out and told that this organization would have no part in passing any such resolutions at this meeting in Washington?

I know, knowing the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, as I know him, and knowing his interest in the welfare of this land, that deep in his heart he must now be sorely chagrined and mortified in view of what has happened and transpired at this American Youth Congress, so-called, which met here last week, and I am happy to know that the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, after carefully reading the remarks which I made, finally came to the conclusion that there was not anything in those remarks which cast aspersions upon the First Lady of the Land, but, perhaps, it was because of the inflection of my voice or the way I parted my hair or the way I appeared which caused him to conclude that there was something in the remarks which a careful reading on the gentleman's part could not disclose. Am I right in that, sir?

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman from Wisconsin is one of the most forceful speakers upon this floor. I have complimented him on his appearance at other times, and he does have a very forceful manner. If I were guilty, I would hate to have him as the prosecuting attorney following me up. I prefer to read his remarks in the cool quiet of my office, and if they need a reply I will come back on the floor when I get some time.

Mr. KEEFE. I am very happy to know that the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, having read the remarks, that caused the gentleman so much chagrin and embarrassment, in the quiet and solitude of his office, found that there was nothing in my remarks that caused that embarrassment but that, perhaps it was the manner in which I stated it.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KEEFE. I would prefer not to yield at this time. I have quite a little more I want to say, and then I shall be too happy to yield if I have the time.

Now, at a later date, Members of the Congress, and following this speech by the gentleman from Oregon, Governor PIERCE, to which I have referred—in fact, it appears on page 1437 of the proceedings under date of February 13—I put into the RECORD a little bit of a compilation, you will recall, as to the people who were invited to the White House. Now, in doing this I acted upon very definite proof which appeared in the public press, and which listed 27 Representatives and a certain number of Senators. I analyzed the names of these people and no one has challenged to this date the accuracy of that analysis except in one thing. I do not know whether to apologize or not, but I want the RECORD to be made straight, and I do this out of deference to my very good friend the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. GEORGE JOHNSON, whom I sit with on a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee and as to whom I know there is no better American sitting in this House. [Applause.] In that statement, through error, due to the fact there are a large number of JOHNSONS in the House, the name of the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. GEORGE JOHNSON, was mentioned as having been invited to this White House conference. Now, I do not take it as any insult to the gentleman from West Virginia to have been invited to the White House, but because there may be some implications involved in what transpired later, I want to say to this House and to the gentleman from West Virginia that the gentleman was not invited, and I had not intended to say that he was. The gentleman who was invited was the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. JED JOHNSON, and not the gentleman from West Virginia, and to that extent I want to correct the RECORD; and if any apologies are necessary to my friend the gentleman from West Virginia I very, very cheerfully and gratefully tender them to him at this time.

Now, having put that in the RECORD, my dear friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] appeared on the floor.

I waited around here until very nearly 6 o'clock, because the gentleman told me he was going to speak, but I had a speaking engagement that night and I was 2 hours late in filling it, even after flying, so I was unable to be here when the gentleman made his statement, but the gentleman did say in his statement under date of February 9, page 1345, of the RECORD, that I was a Sherlock Holmes, or acting as a Sherlock Holmes playing detective, and that my statement was based upon a distortion of facts and a distortion of the truth. So far as I am concerned, let us see what the distortion of fact was. The gentleman later on in his speech said that I had charged in a previous speech that there was discussed at this White House conference the question of the infiltration of Communists into the American Youth Congress, and the gentleman rises in great dignity to say that that was a distortion of the truth because that was not the discussion, that the discussion was, Now that the Communists are in this congress, shall we kick them out? [Laughter.]

To me, Mr. Chairman, that is what the President would call tweedledum and tweedledee. If that was the discussion, and I am advised by a number of Representatives who were there that the discussion was quite general on the subject, being as how the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] was there in close attendance, and greatly interested in what took place, I shall accept his version as to what did take place, and admit, as it now appears, that the question under discussion was, Shall these Communists now in, and admittedly in, be kicked out? On that question the gentleman from New York took the negative. I call attention to the fact that perhaps there may be some inconsistency in that respect, because this Civil Liberties Union, which the gentleman from New York served as counsel, just recently, so it is reported in the press, kicked out all of the Communists from that organization. This Civil Liberties Union, acting as the very guardian of the rights of civil liberty, the organization in this country that the gentleman served as counsel, which is designed to protect the rights of civil liberties, passed resolutions kicking the Communists out of it, and that fact was plastered all over the press of this country and has not been denied by anyone. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman went further than that. He said that I was in error because I said that he alone took the opposite view.

He said that he was not alone, that some others spoke in the same vein that he did, and he added:

I won't tell who they were, or mention any names, but they are here.

As if by prearrangement, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] bobbed up on his feet and said:

Will the gentleman yield?

The gentleman from New York yielded and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] declared:

I was one of those men who were present, and I made a statement on the floor this afternoon, and I am going to continue to make that statement the balance of my life.

Of course, that is the privilege of every Member of Congress and every American citizen. The gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] likewise said that he spoke and took the position that the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] took. I accept that. I am glad to correct the RECORD. I am glad to know that the position of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] was approved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] and the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER], and I also understand from private conversation with my friend from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] that a Senator likewise sustained his position. So that the RECORD may be clear, and there may be no question about it, I accept the position of the gentleman from New York on that question.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman refers to the Bill of Rights. In his speech by inference he makes it appear that I am one of those who oppose the application of the Bill of Rights. Had the gentleman taken time to read the address which I delivered and which appears in the RECORD under date of January 23, page 588, he would see my position very clearly and definitely exemplified, and I restate it now, because I think it is the opinion and position of a great majority of the people of this country. I think it is high time, in view of the situation that exists in the world today, that this question of the Bill of Rights should be somewhat reappraised. There was not the international situation and there was not in existence a situation such as exists in Russia today at the time the Bill of Rights was written. We now have it admitted from the record of testimony of Mr. Browder and Mr. Foster before the Dies committee that no man or woman can be a Communist in good standing in this country unless he takes his orders from Moscow, and owes his allegiance not to the United States but to the hosts of Stalin and the ideology of Stalin.

I say to you, and I want my position known definitely, that I draw a line of distinction between those great liberals like the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], who is an American, who believes in the American system and the preservation of our democracy, and who, when the time comes, will stand on the side of loyalty to this Government; I draw a line of distinction between men like him and those who have sworn loyalty openly and willfully to the Communist Government of Russia, and who in hearings before a Senate committee have openly stated that they would refuse to bear arms against the Soviet in the event of trouble between this Nation and the Soviet. As to those latter ones, I think the time is here and now when that type of people who have only one hope in view and that is to overthrow and destroy this Government by force and violence, should no longer be permitted to hide behind the cloak of the Bill of Rights to enable them to carry out their nefarious practice; and to that extent the gentleman from New York and I disagree.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. I want to place in the RECORD at this point, and I shall offer it as a part of my remarks, two resolutions that were offered, one by Archibald Roosevelt, Jr., and the others by Messrs. Plavnu and McArthur, which caused their expulsion from this so-called Youth Congress. I want the Members of Congress and the public throughout the Nation to know what those resolutions were. I hope you will read them; and if any real American, with the blood of an American coursing in his veins, could stand up and see those three men kicked out on their faces, taken into custody, and thrown into detention by the police for offering these resolutions, then your idea of Americanism and mine is entirely different.

The resolutions are as follows:

Resolution condemning rape of Finland by Soviet Russia, to be introduced at the American Youth Congress meeting in Washington, February 9–12

(By Archibald Roosevelt, Jr.)

Whereas one of the reasons given for the charge that the American Youth Congress is a front for the Communist Party is that its program has consistently followed the varying party line of the Communist Internationale and the foreign policy of Moscow; and

Whereas the American Youth Congress has gone on record "for the support of the peace proposals of the Soviet Union"; and

Whereas during the time it was Soviet policy to denounce aggression, the American Youth Congress vociferously condemned aggression in Ethiopia, Czechoslovakia, Austria, China, and Spain, since the Communist Party defends the Soviet attack on Finland, the American Youth Congress has failed to find "a moral issue involved" in the Finnish invasion; and

Whereas in agreement with the Moscow policy on Loyalist Spain, the American Youth Congress urged cooperation with the United Youth Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy (Loyalist) "to the end that our united forces may give the maximum amount of assistance to the people of Spain"; and

Whereas a resolution was passed to raise $250,000 by means of bazaars, parties, and collections for relief in China, the plight of bombed civilians in Finland's subzero winter has aroused no corresponding sympathy in the American Youth Congress; and

Whereas when the Soviet Government demanded the quarantine of aggressors in 1937, the American Youth Congress urged President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull to declare Italy and Germany at war with Spain and embargoed, and resolved that "whenever any nation uses its armed land, naval, or air forces with or without a declaration of war to invade the territory or attack the vessels or blockade the ports of another nation, the President shall proclaim that nation to be an aggressor," when President Roosevelt intimated that the Soviet Union was guilty of aggression in Finland, the American Youth Congress denounced him as a war monger;

Whereas when the Communist Party and the Soviet Union were in favor of collective security, the American Youth Congress, through the World Youth Congress, passed a resolution demanding that the League of Nations recognize aggression and deal with the aggressors accordingly, now that the League has recognized the invasion of Finland and branded the Soviet Union an aggressor, the Youth Congress sneers at the "discovery of a moral issue in Finland";

Whereas in line with the Communist Party policy, the American Youth Congress, through the World Youth Congress, called for "an internationally guaranteed loan to China to enable her to buy the arms necessary for her defense and to repair the ravages of war," the New York American Youth Congress bitterly attacks any proposed loans to Finland as an attempt to force America into "the imperialist war";

Whereas in the case of Czechoslovakia, coming before the Hitler-Stalin alliance, France and Britain were urged by the American Youth Congress to stand together against Hitler, they are denounced as imperialistic because they have finally done so in the cases of Poland and Finland—the sole difference being that the Soviet Union has now become Hitler's partner:

Resolved, That the American Youth Congress throw off the suspicions surrounding its policies and for all time clear itself of the charge of Communist domination by immediately:

1. Issue a ringing denunciation of the bloody attempt by Communist Russia to smash the Finnish democracy and to enslave its people under a sinister puppet government set up by Stalin and headed by Otto Kuusinen, official of the Comintern and stooge of the Russian dictator.

2. Calling for support of the heroic Finnish people in the gallant defense of their native land against the brutal Communist invaders.

Resolution demanding that the American Youth Congress condemn communism, nazi-ism, and fascism equally as enemies of American democracy, and expel their sympathizers and fellow travelers, to be introduced at the American Youth Congress meeting in Washington, February 9–12

(Plavner and McArthur)

Whereas the American Youth Congress has been accused of serving as a Trojan horse for the Communist Party and the Moscow Red Internationale; and

Whereas Earl Browder has listed the American Youth Congress as one of the transmission belts of the Communist Party; and

Whereas Earl Browder, now convicted of defrauding the United States Government, has at various times boasted of the close relationship between the American Youth Congress and the Communist Party, as, when writing in the Peoples' Front, he said, "The Young Communist League, with the assistance of the party, has from the beginning played an important part in building the youth-congress movement and formulating its program and activities"; and

Whereas he has in turn been enthusiastically acclaimed by various national conventions of the American Youth Congress; and

Whereas Gil Green, president of the Young Communist League and secretary of its Moscow Internationale, accompanied Browder to Moscow, where they reported to the Kremlin bosses their success in capturing control of the American Youth Congress; and

Whereas Gil Green's cosecretary of the Moscow Red Youth Internationale, Raymond Guyot, recently expelled from the French Parliament and condemned as a traitor, participated prominently in the World Youth Congress held at Vassar in 1938 under the sponsorship of the American Youth Congress; and

Whereas Georgi Dimitroff, secretary of the Communist Internationale, praised the United States Young Communist League for their good work in using the American Youth Congress to bore from within; and

Whereas Otto Kuusinen, now head of the Soviet puppet government set up in Finland by Stalin, praised the American Youth Congress and the Young Communist League, and outlined plans for the American Communists in their efforts to make use of the American Youth Congress for the spreading of Stalin's program among American youth; and

Whereas Gil Green and his associates continue to be part of the American Youth Congress, thereby enabling them to masquerade under false colors; and

Whereas the recognized national youth bodies, such as the Boy Scouts, Boys' Clubs of America, the Catholic Youth, refuse to participate in the American Youth Congress because of its reputed communistic influence; and

Whereas the American Legion at its last national convention condemned the American Youth Congress as a Communist-controlled organization; and

Whereas the American Youth Congress continues to serve as a front for the Young Communist League and its various Trojan-horse groups who make use of the name American Youth Congress to conceal their true identity; and

Whereas the pact between Stalin and Hitler, the rape of Poland, and the invasion of Finland destroy any illusions as to a distinction between communism, nazi-ism, and fascism; and

Whereas the American Youth Congress' action last summer in refusing to come out with an outright condemnation of communism, but nevertheless passing resolutions condemning the Nazi bund and Father Coughlin, and failing to include the Communist Party and Earl Browder, provides sufficient evidence to suspect the American Youth Congress of being under the influence of the Communists and their fellow travelers; and

Whereas, in accordance with Soviety policy, the American Youth Congress has frequently denounced the invasion of Austria, Ethiopia, Spain, China, and Czechoslovakia, and adopted resolutions calling for aid and sympathy to the victims of these aggressions, it has ignored the equally brutal invasion of Finland by the Soviet Union and has placed itself on record as being completely disinterested in the fate of Finnish democracy;

Resolved, That the American Youth Congress clearly demonstrate that it is not a Communist front and is absolutely free of Communist influence by:

1. Condemning communism, nazi-ism, and fascism, alike and equally as enemies of the American system.

2. Expelling the Young Communist League and its Trojan-horse organizations as listed in the Dies committee report: American League for Peace and Democracy, International Workers' Order, American Student Union, Friends of the Soviet Union, National Negro Congress, Southern Negro Youth Congress, League of American Writers, Workers' Alliance, Spanish Refugee Relief Campaign, North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy, Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, and International Labor Defense.

3. Asking American Youth Congress officials such as Joseph Cadden, executive secretary, who are members of the above-listed Communist front organizations, to resign from and to repudiate these organizations or to be expelled from the American Youth Congress.

4. The same ruling to apply to the Nazi and Fascist organizations and their Trojan-horse groups, if there be any in the American Youth Congress.

Mr. KEEFE. So that the RECORD may further be straight, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] rose during the speech of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO], and he really was quite critical of me. I barely know the gentleman, but he said that I did a very poor job of "Sherlock Holmesing." I am not a Sherlock Holmes. Sherlock Holmes is fictional. I made no investigation. I am a human being. A human being is liable to err. If I err, I shall come before the Congress and admit it. Sherlock Holmes, being fictional, never erred. He always proved to be right. I know that I may frequently be wrong. If I am, I hope I shall admit it, and I was in hopes perhaps that the President, who once said that if he ever made a mistake he would be the first to admit it, would also follow that same course. But I have not heard of any admission of mistakes up to date. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania made it appear that I was in error, because there were some gentlemen from Pennsylvania who were invited, who did not attend this conference. I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he read my remarks or whether he knew what I had stated, because if he had read my remarks he could not have possibly made the speech he made, because at no time and at no place did I ever say that any person, or name any person who was in attendance at this meeting. I simply listed those who were invited. That is all. I do not know who attended. But as a result of that little interlude we have been getting the facts day by day, and after all that is what I sought to do. As the facts come out, if there is any question about it, after a while we will be able to piece this thing together and learn the real facts, because the newspaper reporters were barred from this little private conference up at the White House.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I am sorry. I do not have time.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I just wanted to tell the gentleman that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] was not on the floor, and I would be glad, and I know he would be glad, too, if the gentleman would withhold his remarks with reference to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] until he was present.

Mr. KEEFE. I was not on the floor when he spoke. In fact, I was not on the floor when any of this took place. I do not yield further. I only have a few minutes more.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] is a fine gentleman. I have said nothing disparaging of him at all. I do not see the gentleman's great interest in this situation. I have simply called the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY'S] attention to the fact, and I want you to know it, that at no time did I ever name any person that was at that conference. I simply listed those who were invited. When the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCGRANERY] charged that I said certain people were there, he said something which was not in accordance with the facts; and the RECORD will speak for itself.

Now, I cannot pass without saying a word about my friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK]. The gentleman took me to task yesterday when I was sitting in the Appropriations Subcommittee meeting, and I was called down and I came down. Now, the gentleman made some rather cutting remarks. I know that he did not intend it. He is a good friend of mine, and I like him. He likes to be a humorist. He does not say anything except a little humorous twit once in a while.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. KEEFE. The gentleman from Alabama has acquired quite a reputation in this House of being a humorist, but in this speech I did take exception to this. He says:

I have been looking for him to smile ever since he came to Congress, but I have not yet seen him smile.

[Laughter.]

I want to say to the gentleman that since he has assumed the role of humorist, poet laureate of the House, and jester of the House I have not heard a single alleged joke or a single story that was not so archaic that it could not provoke a smile on my face. [Laughter.]

Perhaps that justifies the fact that I am a little serious. And then also there is the fact that I am a little bit worried about the situation of the country, as the gentleman from Oregon is. We are all just a little bit worried, and we all admit it if we are honest. We are worried as to what is going to happen, and we do get serious, and perhaps a little overserious. Maybe it is because there are others in the House that are serious and even too serious, that the death roll in this House has mounted to 23 during this last session of Congress. I do not want to be serious. I want to look at things through the eyes of an optimist, but it is mighty hard to do it. The gentleman ought not to charge me with being so serious that I cannot appreciate a smile and appreciate a joke once in a while. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to incorporate certain material in them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to obtain that permission in the House.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Chairman, we have heard a brilliant summation, and it left the country and the House with the impression that it was the summation in a real, important murder case. It was a murder-case summation, but the defendant was charged with only stealing a bag of peanuts. [Laughter.]

The gentleman from Wisconsin has seen fit to pick on this White House incident as the one big thing to fight about. Very well. I now am going to let him in on another big secret. Do you not know that they served us beer and sandwiches on that occasion that night? The gentleman should put that in the RECORD. [Applause.]

Mr. KEEFE. Was the beer Milwaukee beer?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes; it was good American beer without any Communist brand in it at all. It was not Moscow beer. [Laughter.]

Mr. KEEFE. I am happy to learn that. [Applause.]

Mr. MARCANTONIO. And it was so American that I had two glasses of it. The gentleman should have known that. There is something wrong with Sherlock Holmes this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I think this business of raising the Communist scare every time a serious question comes up ought to stop. This House is making one grand record. For 4 weeks we have been fighting the Communists, for 4 days the Youth Congress, and yesterday we even fought the Indians. The Indians took an awful beating on the floor of the House yesterday. [Laughter.] So it is either Communists or Indians. I do not know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin, the other gentlemen who fought the Indians, and the other gentlemen who are fighting the Communists daily have assumed the permanent role of Don Quixote and intend to fight windmills, shadow box, and continue to dodge the real vital problems that face the American people until the end of the session. That is their responsibility.

Mr. KEEFE. Does the gentleman mean to say that I fought the Indians yesterday?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. No; the gentleman did not fight the Indians yesterday; he is not guilty—not guilty. Let us get the record straight. The gentleman did not fight the Indians. [Laughter.] I think it is unfair for anybody even to intimate that the gentleman fought the Indians.

I think the gentleman from Wisconsin gave us a very illuminating statement with regard to his views on the youth problem. He says: "I am for the youth. I have three children." I believe the gentleman is also a good father and a good American, and I also believe that the gentleman does not advocate wife beating; but that is not the question. The question is, Despite all this stone throwing at these boys and girls, what are you going to do for young America? You are enraged because they hissed. Sure they hissed—I am against hissing in the galleries, I am against any infraction of the rules; but, after all, we have been dishing it out here day in and day out, and I think it is perfectly good American sportsmanship to learn how to take it if you want to continue to dish it out; and those kids did some dishing out themselves the other day, after having been on the receiving end for 4 days. [Applause.]

Assuming that there are Communists in the American Youth Congress—and everybody admits that they are in a small minority—are you going to eternally dodge the youth problem because the American Youth Congress refuses to follow the example of this Congress of whittling away at the Bill of Rights?

These boys and girls came here with a problem: 4,700,000 young men and young women out of work, without educational opportunities; they came here and said to the Members of Congress, to the fathers of this country, to the elder statesmen of America: "What are you going to do for us?"

And what do you say? "Save America from communism!"

They came here and said: "We are deprived of educational facilities; what are you going to do about it?"

And what do you say? "Save America from communism!"

They came to us and said: "No jobs for 4,700,000 boys and girls, American boys and girls in the richest country of the world; deprived of the American traditional opportunity, the opportunity for which America has always stood." And what do you say? "Save America from communism!"

Let us quit kidding the American people. They are beginning to get wise to us. They are sick and tired of this gag about communism. The gag is beginning to wear thin. They want action. The farmers want action, labor wants action, the unemployed want action, business wants action, and American youth wants action. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a number of inquiries have been made asking the significance of that portion of the report accompanying this bill which touches upon the airplane pilot-training policy. You will recall that the committee pointed out that in order to provide the requisite number of pilots the Department had modified the course of training, and, in the language of the report, "reduced the time required for completion of the training from 14 months to 7 months."

In questioning the wisdom of the reduction of time consumed in the training of pilots, the committee voiced its conviction that insofar as training can accomplish effectiveness and safety, neither time nor money should be spared. The language of the report, however, is to be taken as cautionary against undue relaxation of training rather than as disapproval of the policy now in effect. Especially is this so since the shortened course is being used only for the Naval Reserve and the Marine Corps Reserve aviation cadets and not for the officers and enlisted men of the Regular Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard.

The reduction in over-all time has not been attended by a corresponding decrease in flying time per student. The latter has been reduced about one-third, or from approximately 314 hours to approximately 210 hours. This has been made possible by certain changes in the preflight training schedule and by increasing the flying hours per student per week as a result of utilization of more daylight hours and increased night operations.

In the last half of the course aviation cadets specialize in their training and as approximate result of that specialization are given about twice as much training in the specialty as they formerly received in the longer course. As an instance, the student in the patrol plane specialty has a total of around 80 hours upon completion of his course as against about 40 hours under the former system. Accordingly, he reports to his fleet assignment with considerably greater proficiency in his specialty than he would have attained under the longer course.

The course of training for officers and enlisted men in the Regular Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard has not been curtailed in any sense of the word, the shortened course being given only to aviation cadets. No serious objection can be made to this policy since if these officers are to be assigned to the type of squadron for which they are specialized. If it should later become necessary or practicable to assign them to other types of aircraft, they can be given appropriate training to qualify them for that duty.

The committee recognizes the necessity for the adoption of measures to increase the pilot output to meet the actual urgent needs of the Navy and to make possible more progress in building up the Naval Reserve, but, without condemning the policy now followed, feels that it should recommend that no pains be spared to accomplish the highest degree of efficiency and safety in aviation. It may be here pointed out that the Secretary of the Navy has recently said:

> The Navy Department recognizes the desirability of giving each pilot the full course and expects to return to this procedure at such time as circumstances warrant doing so. In the meantime, you may be assured that the shorter course is not only necessary to meet a serious shortage in trained pilots, but, because of the specialized training and specialized duty contemplated for these officers, does not increase the hazard either to personnel or material.

[Applause.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, it had been my intention to ask for time in view of the controversy which arose through the visit of the American Youth Congress delegates to Washington in order that I might have the opportunity to state my own position with respect to what has taken place; however, in view of developments here today I think perhaps this is just as good a time as any to discuss the subject. Perhaps those things which I say will not meet with the approval of various individuals in this House, but I have tried consistently while a Member of this body to guide my vote according to the dictates of my conscience. I do not think anyone will accuse me of being even conservative. I have supported all liberal legislation, such as the wage-hour law, W. P. A. appropriations, National Youth Administration appropriations, social-security legislation, and I am wholeheartedly interested in the youth of this Nation. I have voted against the Dies committee on two different occasions, although I voted for the creation of that committee the first time the resolution was presented to the House.

My reasons for voting against the Dies committee was not because I am in sympathy with communism because I detest it as much as anyone in this House. To me the Dies committee has through its procedure at least furnished an opportunity to a malicious press to smear certain individuals in this country whose patriotism is above reproach, as in the case of the gentleman who today graces the Supreme Court Bench, Mr. Murphy.

Men closely identified with this administration and leaders of labor who were no more in sympathy with communism than you and I, were smeared in the press, and nothing was done, in my opinion, to stamp out those things which cause communism. It seems a bit inconsistent to me that someone who would oppose wage-and-hour legislation, a minimum wage of $12 a week to American citizens, would then get exercised about the evils of communism when it is those things which furnish the Communists with the opportunity to delude and mislead the American people. So much for that. That is the reason I voted against the Dies Committee, and I am willing to take my stand with respect to my own patriotism as to whether or not I am a better patriot if I support the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], for instance, as chairman of his committee, in view of what the press has done to the characters of many outstanding Americans, or whether I follow the distinguished gentleman from California, one of the few men who ever sat in this body and who has at the same time the distinction of having been awarded the Congressional Medal. I prefer to follow a patriot who has proven his patriotism on a question of this kind. I refer to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC], and I think I am in good company. I say this without any reflection upon the patriotism of any other Member of this House who is a member of that committee or any other committee of the House.

Now, with reference to American youth, I am interested in the youth of the country, but because I am sincerely opposed to communism I think a liberal should be very careful, that he should not furnish even sympathy to those who perhaps believe in the philosophy of communism. I am the father of four children, and in that respect I am just a little bit ahead of my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin. I would like to have those children interest themselves in things which are for the welfare of the American youth; but notwithstanding that the Bill of Rights grants to anyone the right to hold to any political philosophy, provided he does not advocate the overthrow of this Government by violence, there is nothing in the Bill of Rights which compels me to fraternize with Communists, and I say to those who lead the American youth movement if they want to get the wholehearted support and sympathy of the parents of this Nation, they will see that there is no place in the American youth movement for those who adhere to the tenets of communism.

I do not fear communism because of the reforms it advocates in the field of economics. Those things will take care of themselves, because human nature, after all, depends on initiative and there would be a return to sound economic principles, even though communism destroys them temporarily. I fear communism because of what it does to the soul of the Nation and to the soul of youth, and because it would destroy the one thing we have which furnishes us with hope and with salvation; that is, the belief in God and in religion. I cannot subscribe to any movement which fraternizes with those who would destroy everything that I hold near and dear to me. So I would say to those leaders of youth, if they want the blessing of the American people, if they want the support of those friends of theirs who are really interested in them, they will make their movement one in which there is no danger that our children will have to fraternize with anyone who might possibly be an agent of Moscow or any other foreign government.

Let me indulge in just a little humor. I like the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE]. I like the way he fights upon the floor of this House. I am going to be a little bit humorous. Maybe he is making a bit of a mistake. You know the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, has gotten a lot of publicity and the gentleman from Wisconsin may think, perhaps, he can share that with the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES. You know the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, is a pretty smart fellow. Those of us who know him know that, while he might be genial with regard to any Member of the House who wants to bask in this limelight of publicity, when the real moving pictures are being taken and the real headlines are being written, he will see that everybody else will be far down in the rear of the parade.

I would like to mention that to the gentleman from Wisconsin in a kindly spirit. He cannot steal this baby from the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, because the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES, is one of the most astute individuals in protecting babies of that kind that we have here in Washington.

I think every Member of the House realizes that he is smarter than all of us in that respect, and when any publicity is going around, Martin is going to get it if it is to be gotten. So I would just ask the gentleman to remember that so he will not have any illusions about Martin being willing to share this with anybody, because he just will not do it. That Demagog Club means too much to him.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I may say to the gentleman that I just barely know the gentleman from Texas, MARTIN DIES. I met him to speak to him for the first time this morning, just to say hello. I want to assure the gentleman that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] can have all the publicity there is connected with that movement, and I am not motivated in any sense to want to share in that publicity.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I demand that the words of the gentleman just used with reference to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], that he was a demagogue, be taken down.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing that the gentleman have those remarks taken down. I said that Mr. DIES was not president of the Demagogue Club for 8 years for nothing.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist that the words be taken down?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do; and I ask that the definition of "demagogue" be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman insists on his point of order?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do; and I say that in view of the fact that our Speaker was recently referred to in the same manner in one of the Washington papers. It is about time we understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the words taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

As I say, he is a pretty smart fellow, and, after all, he has not been president of the Demagog Club for 8 years for nothing, without learning how to take care of his prerogatives as far as publicity is concerned.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Is it not possible under the rules for the gentleman to withdraw the controversial words by unanimous consent?

The CHAIRMAN. No such request has been made.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, may I say something to the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman may submit a unanimous-consent request.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Not at this moment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will rise.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8438, the Navy Department and naval service appropriation bill, 1941, certain words used in debate were objected to and on request were taken down and read at the Clerk's desk, and that he herewith reported the same to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the words taken down.

The Clerk read as follows:

As I say, he is a pretty smart fellow; and, after all, he has not been president of the Demagog Club for 8 years for nothing, without learning how to take care of his prerogatives as far as publicity is concerned.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the words to which I objected are not all reported. There was a further statement there containing similar language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to raise that question now.

Mr. HOFFMAN. May I raise it tomorrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not pass on that now.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Tomorrow is too late?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rules, the gentleman will understand, he should have made that request before the Committee rose. The matter is now out of the hands of the present occupant of the chair.

The language as reported to the Chair is as follows:

As I say, he is a pretty smart fellow, and after all, he has not been president of the Demagogue Club for 8 years for nothing, without learning how to take care of his prerogatives as far as publicity is concerned.

Rule XIV, Paragraph 1, reads as follows:

When any Member desires to speak or deliver any matter to the House, he shall rise and respectfully address himself to "Mr. Speaker," and, on being recognized, may address the House from any place on the floor or from the Clerk's desk, and shall confine himself to the question under debate, avoiding personality.

This, the Chair really thinks, is a pretty close question, but the Chair feels constrained to hold that in the language the gentleman used he did not avoid personality.

Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRADLEY] desire recognition?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. The Chair has asked me if I wish recognition. I wish recognition in connection with the point of order raised by my colleague the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already ruled on that.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the indulgence of the Chair and the House, I will say that there was nothing derogatory intended in my remarks. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] himself is the self-constituted president of the cloak-room Demagog Club.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not have anything to do with the legislation under consideration. If the gentleman does not desire to indulge in personalities here he can very easily cure the situation.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, am I to understand that the ruling of the Chair is that my remarks were not in order because they were not in connection with the legislation under discussion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And in that they did not avoid personality, under the rules of the House.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Under those circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee will resume its sitting.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8438, with Br. BLAND in the chair.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I want to say to the gentleman that I have listened to what he has stated here with a great deal of pleasure and a great deal of interest, and I am happy to note the attitude that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has manifessed, and I hope the gentleman manifested that same attitude at the time this matter was under discussion at the White House, because it is stated that a large number of Representatives who were there stated exactly the position that the gentleman from Pennsylvania announced today.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I want to thank the gentleman; I was invited to the White House meeting, but I did not attend, because I was not in Washington; but I think that both the President of the United States and Mrs. Roosevelt have in no mistaken terms indicated where they stand with respect to American institutions and with regard to their attitude with reference to communism; and I think their public utterances are an assurance to this Nation, and they ought to answer many critics who repeat things that are unfounded. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'LEARY].

Mr. O'LEARY. Mr. Chairman, the United States Navy should be second to none in the world. Sea power is our best defense—our only real assurance of peace and security.

Aggression stalks the world. The modern manner of waging war allows no time to prepare. We must be ever ready. Have we not been witnesses to the lightning strokes of the modern war machines? We are living at a time when weakness means death and strength means life.

Whatever were the merits of various international boundary arguments preceding the present wars, one fact remains undisputed and that is—only those nations least able to defend themselves have been attacked and put under the sword.

Assertions that a strong and formidable United States Navy would be an imperialistic weapon are refuted by our good-neighbor policy which in the past has restored Cuba to its people and by act of Congress will give to the Filipinos their native land, to have and to hold, for the first time in four centuries.

Rather does a strong American Navy assure peace and security to our neighbors in Central and South America who have viewed with alarm the subjugation of smaller and weaker nations in other parts of the world.

There is no single nation on earth today with a more extensive and valuable coast line to defend than the United States. This coast line is skirted by the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and the Caribbean Sea. The Panama Canal is the only strategic connection between these eastern and western seas.

Through the Monroe Doctrine we have assumed for well over a century the defense of the American continents against aggression. The wisdom of this policy has been demonstrated many times. The Monroe Doctrine has maintained peace in the Western Hemisphere while war rages in other parts of the world. Today the Monroe Doctrine is more essential to our own security, as well as our neighbors', than when it was enunciated.

This sound protective policy, however, compels our Navy to expand its defensive operations over the North and South Atlantic, the Caribbean Sea and the North and South Pacific.

Why these expansive sea operations? They are conducted not only to maintain the Monroe Doctrine but for the reason that the United States, if attacked, would not be attacked directly. Aggression or invasion, if ever attempted, would come by sea through Canada or Mexico preceded by lodgments of airplane bases in Central and South America or on the islands of the Pacific, Caribbean, and the Atlantic.

Certainly it would be a difficult and hazardous undertaking to attempt any kind of an invasion of the United States under ordinary circumstances. But invasions are never attempted under ordinary circumstances. Invasions are usually launched by a combination of nations. We say an invasion is improbable—a mighty navy will make it next to impossible.

We must look ahead, always mindful of what has happened in the past, in our own time, during these very days. When imperial Germany went to war in 1914 with the most formidable military force in history, did any of her greatest naval and military experts foresee that an American Expeditionary Force of more than 2,000,000 men would be swarming across her borders within a few short years? Even in 1917, Hindenburg and Von Tirpitz did not foresee the consequences or they would never have embarked on the unrestricted submarine warfare that brought the A. E. F. upon them.

The American troops did not land in Germany. They were landed in France without the loss of a man. Germany had not the sea power to prevent their disembarking, while the Allies had the sea power to accomplish the feat. And superior sea power kept open the lines of communication so that ample supplies flowed without interruption across the Atlantic.

The United States Navy and Army taught Germany and Europe a great lesson in military movements and ourselves a more important one. Through the exploits of our service men in 1917–18, Europe's naval and military strategists have added to their positive knowledge. Therefore, in considering the United States as a factor to be reckoned with, today's foreign militarists will hardly make the grave mistakes of their predecessors. For, guided only by theory, Hindenburg and Von Tirpitz believed America could be disregarded as a factor among the powers of the earth. These German strategists, with all their great prestige, took the biggest military gamble in history and lost to the A. E. F. and the United States Navy.

Having demonstrated ourselves a power to reckon with, we have learned to stay out of Europe and let the record speak for itself. We have learned through the landing of the A. E. F. the necessity of absolutely dominating the seas about the Western Hemisphere if we are to be secure against invasion.

From the lessons taught by the A. E. F. and our Navy, I have resolved that a powerful navy is the greatest guardian of peace. I have further resolved never to vote to send a single American soldier to fight on foreign soil. The sacrifices made by the soldiers and sailors of the World War were not in vain, for I believe they have saved the present generation from involvement in war and have pointed the way to peace and security for ourselves and our posterity. Their courage, loyalty, and skill in arms have compelled a respect for the United States throughout the world that will make the rashest aggressor hesitate to provoke us to the point of war. They taught us also not to be swayed by minor annoyances into a warlike spirit out of all proportion to our grievances.

The experiences of the World War are fresh in our memories. We have seen that sea power is vital to the very existence of a great maritime nation like the United States. So it is if we go back through history. There we find that any nation attaining commercial and industrial preeminence and greatness in natural resources had to maintain its existence by sea power and waned when its sea power waned. Such was the experience of Egypt, Phoenicia, Carthage, Greece, and Rome.

The expansion of our Navy means the expansion of a splendid personnel recruited from among the flower of our youth. The Navy has reached its highest standard of excellence in personnel. The young men trained by the Navy are prepared to attain better civilian standards of living through the trades and vocations taught them during their service.

A highly important phase of naval expansion is the intensive ship-construction program that will provide thousands of jobs for the skilled workmen in our shipyards. These men will be put to useful work in building up our national defense.

In the past years these men have suffered severely from lack of employment. I speak from first-hand knowledge in this respect, since about 3,000 such trained workmen reside in the Staten Island section of my district. They are substantial men, largely home owners, upon whom the community depends materially for its existence.

True, the yards in my district are just beginning to benefit by the construction of naval auxiliary craft, such as tugs and merchant ships. However, additional work is necessary in these yards to build up a backlog so that mechanics of all trades can be kept employed in the various stages of construction.

Let me elaborate on this phase of my argument. There are two naval tugs in the last stages of construction and one has already been completed. The types of mechanic used on the completion are entirely different from the mechanics employed on the five C1-type ships at this stage of construction.

If we can secure three destroyers by the time the keels of these boats are ready the construction of the C1 type would have advanced to the point whereby the mechanics employed during the completion stage of the ships would be kept busy. This would effect a rotation of mechanics and provide plenty of work for all in the industry.

These same benefits will accrue to every shipyard on the three coasts of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS].

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, I think the Navy appropriation bill, which is under consideration, is one of the most vital matters with which this Congress has to deal. I feel that we are following dangerously close in our conduct today the road we followed from 1914 to 1917 that led us into the World War. I believe, fundamentally, the reason we became engaged in the World War was because we were unable to stay out of it. Had we had the navy in 1914 that Theodore Roosevelt had advocated consistently, I believe we could have avoided entanglement in the World War by the United States. It certainly behooves us to have a navy today which will be adequate to protect our neutrality and to defend our peace.

We seem to forget that the first American ships that were sunk in the World War were sunk, not by the Germans, but by the British. We seem to forget that we protested to the British time after time in 1914 and 1915 and 1916 to no more avail than our protests today and that, finally, the Allies squeezed the Central Powers so hard, frequently by using illegal and unneutral methods against the United States that they, in effect, forced the Central Powers to take the same recourse, and they just pushed us around too much or until, of course, we finally got into it.

Had we had a navy in 1914 that could have defended our commerce, that could have defended our neutrality, neither the Allies nor the Germans would have pushed us around at all. We are being pushed around again today. Whether the European powers feel that we are as weak as we were then or as unwilling to defend our own rights, I do not know, but in those years they mistook our desire to avoid war for weakness on our part. They were convinced that we not only would not fight, but that we could not fight.

I am anxious for just one thing, as is every Member of this House, and that is to avoid our becoming entangled in this or any other war if it can be avoided, but today we are permitting exactly the same thing to happen that led us into the war of 1917. The British are stopping our ships on the high seas, taking them into contraband ports, and under the guise of attempting to prevent contraband from getting to Germany, are doing exactly the same reprehensible, contemptible thing they did from 1914 to 1917. Under the cloak of protecting their blockade against Germany, they are seizing all of our mail. The amount of merchandise or of money that might get to Germany would be insignificant. The truth of it is that what they are after, and what they are getting every day, is an opportunity to examine the manifests and the bills of lading of American merchants and American shippers. They are copying these facts and furnishing them, through their economic control to their own industries and attempting to underbid us in commerce.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. PITTENGER. Those acts are in violation of our present neutrality law?

Mr. MAAS. They are not only a violation of our own neutrality laws, but they are a violation of internationally recognized neutrality laws.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWKS. Do we have any allies in this present war?

Mr. MAAS. I am not talking about "our" allies. I am talking about the Allies. They refer to them as "allies." We have no allies.

Mr. HAWKS. But the reference is to Britain and France as our allies.

Mr. MAAS. The press of the world refers to them as the "Allies."

Mr. HAWKS. And the administration leaders also, do they not?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, I have never put any imputation on them that they are our allies, because they are not.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Would it not be a good idea to prohibit the use of our American seaports by all warships and merchant marine ships of Great Britain and France while they continue to highjack mail and other materials on ships flying the American flag. What have we got a navy for if it is not to protect our flag?

Mr. MAAS. That is exactly what I am proposing and I thank the gentleman for his contribution. What I am suggesting is that we make sure that our Navy is big enough to protect our rights, and that it protect them. Make no mistake. The reason for the British opening our mail is not so much to prevent any possible contraband going to Germany, but it is to get access to information of American business methods. They did the same thing in 1914, and then went out and competed with us, and I am informed today when our ships are dragged into a contraband port and held an unreasonable time, or until it is unprofitable for the shippers, and the shipping concerns, that the bills of lading are all furnished to British concerns, and their agents in this country then go around and solicit the American shippers, recommending that it would be wise for them to ship on a British ship, if they want to make their deliveries certain, and so on. It is nothing in fact but a continued attempt to destroy American commerce. They have been at it for 100 years, and they are still at it.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. PATRICK. That is interesting and the thing I want to hear developed is how long does a proceeding like that usually delay a vessel, and what is the cost of it, and what is the result of such delay to the ship?

Mr. MAAS. The delays have been all the way from 14 to 28 days. I am reliably informed that when a ship is held up from 2 to 3 weeks that the entire profit is gone, and frequently there are very valuable commodities shipped where interest rates are high, as are premium rates on insurance in transit. They do not get it delivered promptly, and when it is delivered the profit of the transaction to the shipper, as well as to the shipping concern, has been destroyed. The main purpose behind it is to destroy and ruin American commerce.

Mr. PATRICK. Has France found it necessary to follow such methods?

Mr. MAAS. Not to the degree that England has.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. And is it not true that Britain is treating other neutrals much better than she does the United States, especially Italy?

Mr. MAAS. Exactly. I think that Britain is trying to win Mussolini away from Hitler. They have been encouraging American shippers to ship on Italian vessels to the Mediterranean ports, so as to curry favor with Italy and at the same time destroy American commerce.

Mr. MILLER. And speaking of the Italian lines, the gentleman may be interested to know that the Assistant Secretary of State is going on the Italian line steamship Rex.

Mr. MAAS. Yes; so he will not be stopped at a contraband port. I suggest that the remedy for this is, first of all, to put all American mail on warships, and let them try to stop those; and I am serious about it. That does not necessarily mean battleships, but the mail should be put on our combatant vessels. One of the greatest prides in America has always been that the mails go through.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. Yes.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman is making a very interesting speech. I have heard it said that the mails are not only intercepted but they sometimes never get to their destination.

Mr. MAAS. I think that is true. Much of the mail is not delivered at all, or it is not delivered until it is too late to be of any value. I have been informed that British merchant firms are given access to this mail, and they offer to fill the orders to our customers when our mail is not delivered, and thereby very seriously interfere with and destroy our commerce.

The Germans have now made an announcement that they are going to sink any American ships brought into a contraband port. That is the road that we went down in 1914. I do not think the British are so interested in stopping our ships to take contraband from them as they are in forcing Germany into acts that will force us into war with Germany. England is determined that America shall be her ally, and, as far as I am concerned, I am just as determined that we do not get into the war. I went through one war. I volunteered the day we entered the war. I am in the Reserve, and I would go tomorrow morning if we have to go to war, but I have not the desire or the intention of saving the British Empire so that it can continue to crush our competition. Some of you people do not realize that the British nation has been supported by forcing us to pay tribute. They have a monopoly on tin. We pay such an excessive price for tin because we are the major user of tin, so that we support the British Government with that monopoly. The same is true of rubber, of course.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. PATRICK. I am interested in the proposition the gentleman has put. Is it quite adequate to attempt to carry and deliver our mails by warships or combatant vessels? Could we carry it? Is the volume there and could that course be pursued as a practical matter?

Mr. MAAS. I do not know just what the gentleman means.

Mr. PATRICK. I mean have we the Navy vessels that the gentleman proposes? Of course, we should carry our mail and do business that way.

Mr. MAAS. We have a lot of destroyers and submarine chasers not now in use. No one will stop our combatant vessels. If they do, they will not do it more than once, I hope.

Mr. PATRICK. The gentleman wants our mail to go through. Of course, that is a record we have all been proud of. But is there on the high seas now and could there be arranged a program of travel—the gentleman has been in the Navy and can answer this——

Mr. MAAS. No; not the Navy; the Marine Corps.

Mr. PATRICK. The Marine Corps. It is more than the Navy.

Mr. MAAS. Oh, I will admit that.

Mr. PATRICK. You ask any marine, and he will tell you so. So I ask the gentleman who has been a marine if it is practical and if it can be done; if the volume of mail that we have could be shipped under this sort of procedure?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, yes. We have many, many wartime destroyers that are tied up, just put in cold storage, that we could put into commission. We can get the mails there if we have the will to get the mails there.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. In 1914 and 1915, when we had similar trouble, it was suggested that Congress place an arms embargo on the shipment of arms to the Allies, or to the English and French, until such time as they observed American rights. Why would that not be a good suggestion at this time?

Mr. MAAS. That is exactly what I am advocating, that we enact legislation to penalize any nation that violates our neutrality by stopping any further commerce in materials or instruments of war, and that we deny our ports to any merchant or combatant vessels of any nation that violates our neutrality. If we do that, they will let us alone. We could have saved ourselves getting into the World War when Great Britain stopped our ships then, when it blockaded neutral ports against neutral ships, if we had said to Great Britain, "You cannot buy anything more in the United States."

Now, I am warning you, we are going down the same road, step by step. To those of us who can remember so clearly the steps that took place between 1914 and 1917 it is like a bad dream. We are walking through the same steps today, and the end will be just exactly the same if we do not check it right now.

I am proposing, first of all, that we put our mails upon combatant vessels of the Navy, and that we make sure that we have enough warships to protect our interests; that we deny our ports and commerce to the vessels of nations that violate our neutrality; and, if necessary, that we convoy American ships with American war vessels. If we will take a firm stand today and say, "We are neutral; we are not going to interfere in this war; but, by the living God, nobody is going to interfere with us," we will be let alone, and we will stay out of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. I have listened with great interest to the very splendid analysis made by the gentleman from Minnesota. I will ask the gentleman if he will make some comment on the continuation of large warships, which was made by the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], and if there is any reason why American ships, from the gentleman's research and experience, should not be made superior in speed, in armament, and weight to those of foreign nations. In other words, is there any merit whatever in the policy of copying or following the designs of other nations in our capital ships?

Mr. MAAS. I do not happen to agree with the distinguished chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee on this matter.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MAAS. I thoroughly believe that the time has come for us to quit trailing the parade and to lead the parade. We are the one nation that can do it. We did it in 1922, and the rest of the world respected us. If they did fear us, they feared our Navy; but we voluntarily gave up that Navy. We had the finest ships in the world. One way to be sure that we will be let alone is to lead the parade, because the rest of them cannot follow us. It will lead to the objective that we all want; they will let us alone, and we will not have to go to war. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I hope this appropriation bill passes Congress without any change. It is the result of a great deal of hard work and study on the part of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations. Great credit is due chiefly to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Naval Appropriations, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM]. He has given unstintingly of his time and energy, working nights as well as days in order to give his country the finest Navy in the world and at the same time having due regard for the present needs for economy.

Assisting him on this small committee that has such a heavy responsibility are the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. FERNANDEZ], the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL], and myself, representing the majority; the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER], the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY], and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD], representing the minority. In this committee it can be truly said that partisanship was left outside of the door. This bill, which we present with pardonable pride to the House, is the result of the work of all the committee and has the unanimous support of all the members of the subcommittee. It was necessary to steer a middle course between those who advocated a gigantic Navy at tremendous cost and those who would put into effect tremendous cuts that would destroy the entire naval program. We have reduced the amount allowed by the Budget $111,699,699.

The reductions were worked out in the following manner: From the construction of ships we cut $28,628,021. These cuts were so worked out as to avoid delaying the naval program. Not a single ship requested has been denied. The amount appropriated, however, has been computed on probable needs of the program for the year.

From airplane purchases and ordnance for new planes, we cut $26,619,600. This reduced the number of planes to be secured by 224. If the Budget estimate had been allowed the Navy on July 1, 1941, would have more than 3,100 planes, whereas the present authorization act contemplates a minimum of 3,000 planes by 1944. We are, therefore, 3 years ahead of the program. The committee was very generous with respect to the building of prototypes. It included an amount of $2,000,000 for the purchase of prototypes and other experimental aircraft because we want this country to be second to none in modern improvements. With respect to new development, there has been no stinting in the appropriation for research and experimentation in aviation. Experience has shown, however, that new ideas for improvements in aircraft come out of every war. Out of actual combat will come new designs both for the planes themselves and for the engines which propel the planes. If we are to embark upon a program at the present time of building a great many planes, more than necessary under the present authorization act, we might well find ourselves, shortly after the close of the war, in possession of planes which would be obsolete.

With respect to the subject of public works, we cut $8,596,525. We studied all of these items carefully and allowed those which appeared to be urgently required, and eliminated only those which might be deferred without serious interference to the naval program.

With respect to the pay of the Navy, the committee made a reduction of $9,487,722. This will necessitate a reduction in the enlisted personnel of two thousand under the Budget but it allows a five-thousand increase over the current year. The officer personnel was left the same except for 500 retired commissioned officers on active duty, which number we felt, after careful consideration, would not be required unless the situation becomes more critical than is now apparent. This bill does allow one-half the number requested for 500 retired commissioned officers on active duty.

With respect to the subject of submarine nets and boats for handling them, the committee cut out the entire amount requested, which was $25,871,140. This cut was predicated upon the proposition that harbor nets will not be required unless we get into war. The committee was not impressed with the possibility of a foreign navy being able to attack our shore lines. We think our Navy and air forces are sufficiently strong to meet any enemy fleet, which must of necessity come from a long distance, far enough out on the ocean to prevent shore attack.

The total reduction in the above items amounts to $99,203,008, and the remainder of the reduction, $12,496,691, is spread over numerous items where the committee determined that requirements could be met with lesser amounts than contemplated by the Budget.

I am gratified to hear from all sides compliments for the committee's work, and particularly to hear the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, praise this bill in such glowing terms. This is praise coming from a big-navy man. On the other hand, the bill has received high praise from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW], who is probably the leading peace advocate in the House of Representatives. A bill that satisfies both extremes certainly deserves the support of all Congressmen and the Nation.

I hope that no amendments to reduce the naval appropriation bill further than the committee has reduced it will meet with success. These amendments which I anticipate will be offered will undoubtedly be well intentioned, but they will lack the necessary study and information. Any further cuts in the bill will seriously hamper the program of national defense. The committee has made all possible economies consistent with adequate defense.

Gentlemen, we offer you this bill as a measure which will not sacrifice security on the altar of economy. It steers a straight, middle-of-the-road path. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, since his belligerent "quarantine speech" in Chicago in October of 1937, President Roosevelt has been doing his best to involve the United States in war in Europe and in Asia.

At the very outbreak of the present European war in September last, the President began repeatedly to inject the poison of fear in the veins of public emotionalism. He began seeing phantom submarines off our coast.

These injections of fear preceded the President's demand for the repeal of the arms embargo and laid a splendid foundation for the passage of the unneutral repeal measure.

The repeal measure was debated in Congress from October 30 to November 3, when it was passed. On November 1, in the midst of the debate, a Canadian radio station broadcasted news of a submarine attack on a British ship not far off our coast, a report which it is said had an important influence on the passage of the repeal measure. That this was another phantom submarine may be seen from the following communication from Admiral H. R. Stark, Chief of Naval Operations, Navy Department, Washington, D. C.:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
WASHINGTON, December 13, 1939.

MY DEAR MR. TINKHAM: Your letter of November 25, 1939, addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, regarding the alleged attack by a submarine on the British freighter Coulmore has been referred to this office for reply.

The following is a summary report of the Coulmore incident: At 2:27 a. m., November 1, 1939, the Nova Scotia radio station at Camperdown received a distress message from the British steamship Coulmore, saying she had sighted a submarine in latitude 40–20 north, longitude 62–31 west. The Coulmore was en route from Philadelphia to the British Isles.

Three destroyers and two Coast Guard cutters were ordered to the Coulmore's reported position: U. S. S. Roper, Hatfield, Kane, and U. S. C. G. Bibb and Campbell.

In addition to the surface vessels, 4 Navy planes and 2 Coast Guard planes were ordered to search the area, commencing at daylight.

The Bibb arrived at the Coulmore's reported position at 8:50 a. m., and reported no vessel in sight.

The weather was unfavorable for conducting a proper search. A fresh southerly gale was blowing, and visibility was poor, due to fog and rain The planes, encountering a low ceiling and dangerous flying conditions, were forced to discontinue their search.

The surface vessels continued to search until they were informed that the Coulmore had sent a message at 2:40 a. m., on November 2, that she was safe. Frequent attempts were made to contact the Coulmore by radio from the time when the S O S was received, but nothing was heard from her for about 24 hours.

British naval authorities, who questioned the master of the Coulmore upon his arrival at the British Isles, report that the master states he observed a small searchlight on the port quarter. Assuming it to be a submarine, he changed course radically, started zig-zagging, and sent the radio message reporting a submarine sighted. It is indicated by the officers who took the master's statement that he now is not too sure that he sighted a submarine and probably acted hastily.

Sincerely yours,

H. R. STARK,
Admiral, United States Navy, Chief of Naval Operations.

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,
House of Representatives.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS].

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, unlike the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. CALDWELL] I am going to have the temerity at this time to make a few remarks more or less relevant to the bill, particularly one section of the bill, that providing $3,000,000 to develop harbor facilities at the Island of Guam.

Mr. Chairman, word has gone around in the press and through the House that this item of $3,000,000 for harbor improvement at Guam is an innocuous kind of thing entirely different from the authorization sought last year in the big-navy bill asked for by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON]. It will be remembered that at that time a movement had been started by certain naval authorities, some in active service and some retired, to establish a great naval stronghold—you might say a second Gibraltar or Singapore—at Guam, a United States possession. We had speeches from Admiral Bloch and Admiral Leahy, and Admiral Hepburn; you will remember the Hepburn report, wherein a very comprehensive plan was given to the country whereby we would make Guam a great naval base. The public got stirred up about it and it seems that some of the admirals got a little fearful, so they, in 1939, went before the Naval Affairs Committee and only asked for authorization for $5,000,000 to develop the harbor of Guam as a starter.

The question was asked at that time:

> Why go to the Committee on Naval Affairs for an authorization of $5,000,000 for Guam when that sum could be provided for the purpose stated under existing law and without an authorization?

Admiral Cook, Chief Engineer of the Navy, I believe, said the reason they asked for the authorization was because the Navy decided to lay its cards on the table with respect to Guam. Why did they decide to lay their cards on the table? Since when did high naval authorities seek to lay their cards on the table in asking an authorization from Congress when they already had the right to insert a single item in the appropriation bill itself?

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. I would like to explain that situation. Some of the items in the $5,000,000 request did require legislative approval—not all of them. The dredging did not. The reason that whole item came up, even including dredging which required no legislative authority, was because it was included in the Hepburn board report, and that bill was a bill to carry out the recommendation of the Hepburn board, which the Congress itself had directed. We ordered the Navy to create a board to study the needs of the outlying naval bases, and they reported the whole thing back to us so we would have the complete picture. For that reason the dredging was included; but in that bill also there were construction and development items which are not in the present development at all.

Mr. RICHARDS. I recognize the gentleman from Minnesota as an authority on this question, but if you gentlemen will just stick around here today and tomorrow you will hear a continuation of the argument by the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota in which he has taken the position that the Navy has full authority to do these things at Guam and that it is nothing out of the ordinary at all, because Guam is under naval government. Now, if the Navy has unlimited authority there the Navy does not have to come to Congress for an authorization, but they came last year, anyway, because Admiral Cook said they were going to lay their cards on the table to Congress. Why did they want to lay their cards on the table? Because they wanted Congress to establish a precedent, because the admirals realized that this thing is and was the beginning of the fortification of Guam, and that is their purpose now, though not always openly avowed. The hidden card, the card face down, was the fortification of Guam. The one facing up was the harmless, innocent one of harbor improvements. They wanted to be able to be in the position when they came to Congress for an appropriation later on, to use the argument that Congress had told them to go ahead and do this thing.

They wish to say to Congress: "You have made those investments there, and it behooves you to give us some more ships, give us more guns, give us more airplanes, to protect the investments that we have already made at your direction."

Mr. Chairman, experience teaches us that when the camel gets its nose under the tent, you can count on it he will push right on in. Another reason, I think, for naval authorities coming to Congress last year to get this authorization was because they realized this authorization was going to create a new departure from the time-honored foreign policy of the United States.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Is it not a fact that the original study of the development of the harbor at Guam was made under authorization of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors some few years ago at the request of the Navy Department, and that the report of that study has never yet been made to the Congress of the United States? Last year the Naval Affairs Committee, of which I am a member, favorably reported the bill, and the gentleman and I and many other Members of the House led the fight which defeated it on the floor here. The real facts are as the gentleman states. Ultimately this means the fortification of the island of Guam, only 1,400 miles away from Japan.

Mr. RICHARDS. The gentleman is correct about that. You will remember the fight last year. You will remember that the House decided against this $5,000,000 appropriation because it would require a new departure in the foreign policy of the United States. It insured the success of a movement by naval circles to make the island of Guam one of the strongest fortifications in the world.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MAAS. The statement has been made many times with reference to a new foreign policy. Would the gentleman tell us what this implied new foreign policy is? Even if we did fortify Guam, what is this new foreign policy?

Mr. RICHARDS. It means that the United States is going to embark on an imperialistic policy. I am not defending Japan. A good many Members have gotten up here and talked about Japan, which is just a smoke screen. I do not think there is a Member of the House who has less sympathy for the activities of the Japanese Government and for the ideals of the Japanese Government than I have. I cannot conceive of any enlightened nation embarking on the program on which Japan has embarked. I am not here to argue about Japan. I do not care whether the fortification of Guam makes Japan mad or not. I am speaking of this thing from the standpoint of the United States. It is a senseless proposition and it means that sooner or later the United States Government will have to spend two or three hundred million dollars in fortifying Guam. For what? This is an island 6,000 miles away from here.

Mr. MAAS. What is this new adventure?

Mr. RICHARDS. I will answer the gentleman. Guam is 6,000 miles away from here, or approximately that, with not an American possession beyond, except the Philippine Islands, and we have given our solemn obligation that those islands will be given up by the United States in 1946.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, we have talked about everything this afternoon. We have talked about the American Youth Congress, we have talked about Finland, we have talked about the nebular hypothesis, we have talked about Einstein's theory of relativity, but I want to speak a few minutes about this naval bill. I will have to get right down to the point, because I have not very much time.

Here is what the naval officers did. When the Congress turned down that $5,000,000 last year they turned around and did the very thing they said they did not want to do. They no longer laid their cards on the table before Congress. They inserted this harmless little thing in the appropriation bill, just as they said last year they did not want to do. Do not let anybody tell you today or tomorrow that it is different from last year's provision. Some Members are going to get up here and tell you that.

The distinguished gentleman from Minnesota a few days ago said it was different because this provision provides only for harbor improvement, while the provision last year provided for shore improvement. Study the provision closely. There is not a bit of difference in the world. Here is what Admiral Cooke said last year.

Of the $5,000,000 proposed, at least $4,000,000 will be devoted to dredging and breakwater, the remainder being used for a tender pier, seaplane ramps, and parking area.

There was not a single item in the provision last year for shore establishments except that involving a very small power plant. This year they come back and insert this provision in the appropriation bill even though Congress last year flatly refused to authorize the item.

Mr. Chairman, when the bill is read for amendment tomorrow, I am going to offer an amendment to strike out the Guam provision. We on the eastern seaboard sometimes forget the vast distances of the Pacific. I want you to remember that Guam is about 3,800 miles from our nearest naval base, Pearl Harbor, T. H. I want you to remember it is just as far from there as it is from here to Europe. I want you to use your good common sense, regardless of what our naval experts say. I am always glad to take the advice of naval experts when it comes to the question of what kind of guns are best for naval purposes, or what kind of ship is best, but I am not willing to take the advice of these naval experts when it comes to the question of foreign policy. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8¼ minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLEOD].

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, the fear of national bankruptcy is a deterrent to our economic recovery. Today, our national debt, direct and contingent, exceeds $46,000,000,000, and we are living within a financial structure which at any minute may crumble upon our heads. The first step we must take to reinforce this crumbling structure is to keep appropriations within the bounds of common sense.

Today we are considering an appropriation bill for the Navy Department, a bill which called for over a billion dollars when it was first submitted to the House Naval Appropriations Subcommittee. By diligent wielding of the economy ax, we of that subcommittee have reduced the original request by $111,699,699. I hope and pray that this House will go along with this committee and support to the very end the attempts to stay within the present debt limit of $45,000,000,000.

Such a naval program as requested by the administration must visualize the abandonment of our good-neighbor policy, the policy of arbitrating international disputes, the policy of encouraging peace. Do the people of America wish to abandon these policies and incur instead an annual tax burden to support a billion-dollar navy? Do the citizens wish to make America respected not because of her world-wide known tenets and institutions but because of its tremendous sea power? It is all right to say our objective is peace, but too much power only leads to arrogance, it makes bullies and creates enemies. We have but to look at Europe to find a basis for this statement.

Regarding capital ships, it is interesting to note that the Navy's highest officials testified before the Naval Appropriations Subcommittee that two new battleships, costing $65,000,000 each, will be launched in the spring; and although these huge ships are equal to any craft of other nations at this time, the officials advised against duplicating these battleships because they may soon become obsolete. It is my opinion that this money could have been used more advantageously by building fast, well-armed cruisers of moderate size, submarines, and aircraft carriers. It is also interesting to know that the Navy Department will spend $216,000 of the people's money this year repairing the 36 top-heavy destroyers. However, as long as we have naval designers who advocate 65,000-or-more-ton battleships for the resulting designing fees, we will have top-heavy destroyers and ships with cracked sternposts.

All attempts to receive estimates from the Navy's top ranking officials on the annual upkeep of a billion-dollar navy met with defeat. I gathered the impression that that was a problem for our children to worry about. It is my opinion that $750,000,000 would be adequate to support the kind of national-defense peacetime Navy we should maintain.

We must push aside the profit makers and war mongers. Let us ignore the jittery flag wavers and, with prudence, common sense, and an eye to the future, bend our every effort to stay within the tenets of our international policies and within our own income. Let us not be pulled into a war by our overzealous preparations against it.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the Committee at this time to House Joint Resolution 202, which I introduced in the first session of the present Congress and which has been referred to the Rules Committee. This measure proposes the creation of a fact-finding committee of nine members to determine the limit the public debt can reach with a reasonable degree of safety.

The need for such a committee is greater now than ever before. We are running into the red at the rate of over $14,000,000 each day, or over $600,000 every hour of the day. Our Budget has now been out of balance for several years. Each year the national debt has been larger and now the administration advocates raising the debt limit to $50,000,000,000. It is my firm belief that before we take any action in this regard the problem of establishing an ultimate limit to which the debt can go should be thoroughly studied from every conceivable angle by a group of impartial men versed in the ways of finance.

In support of my appeal for consideration of my resolution, may I also call your attention to the testimony of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Henry Morgenthau, during hearings on the Treasury appropriations bill for 1941, wherein he flatly stated that the Treasury Department does not know the danger point beyond which the national debt must not ascend.

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, I ask you, Can this be called mere lack of interest or does it not border on plain incompetence? Surely the question of how far our Government can live beyond its income should be paramount in the minds of this Nation's fiscal officers. And surely it should be foremost in our minds today as we assemble to authorize or cut governmental funds as recommended in the President's so-called rock-bottom Budget.

It is inconceivable to me that after 8 consecutive years of soaring debts, Treasury officials have not taken the time nor the interest to even estimate the limit beyond which the debt can go without plunging this Nation into bankruptcy. Each one of us on this floor today has studied his own accounts, and we know to a close degree just how much we can take out of our own pockets or borrow without wrecking our personal finances. But do the men who administer the Nation's fiscal policies know how much they can spend or borrow of the people's money without throwing the entire country into the abyss of financial ruin? Evidently they do not. But if they do, and it is not at all improbable that a behind-the-scenes study has been made of this problem, the Treasury Department is keeping its findings a dark secret.

I warn you that perhaps we have passed the danger point. Perhaps this knowledge is already in the hands of Treasury officials who, even at this time, are being driven to frenzied and belated attempts to put the Nation's fiscal affairs back on a sound basis before the inner defects of the past 7 years of wildcat financing become apparent to the Nation as a whole and a complete monetary collapse follows.

If we have passed the danger point, this Congress must ascertain and recognize that fact and immediately set about to remedy the situation as far as possible.

In presenting his Budget message to the Congress, the President resorted to what has been termed "astute political strategy." In other words, he submitted his Budget and in effect said:

This is what I think it will cost to run the Nation for 1941. If you do not like these figures or the taxes I have suggested, you have your choice of raising the debt limit or levying additional taxes. Do not forget this is an election year. In presenting this Budget I disavow all further responsibility. It is your problem child.

Mr. Chairman, it is my conviction that the Nation's financial structure should transcend politics. This country was not built upon such a subterfuge, nor should it continue to operate under such artifices. It is no less than monstrous that the administration should see fit to use its citizens' pocketbooks as pawns in a game of political chess.

We must realize that the people of this Nation whose children and whose children's children must carry this burdensome debt are becoming increasingly alarmed by the continued spending that is taking place day after day, year after year. America is beginning to realize that for the first time in the history of the United States laws are being formulated and methods earnestly discussed to keep the administration from rushing the country into bankruptcy. The citizens and voters are awakening to the fact that the President has spent over 58 percent as much as all the other Presidents of the United States put together in the last 144 years, and has almost exactly doubled the national debt. Have the results justified the means? I do not think so.

In speaking of the public debt, let us take a brief look at its history. On September 24, 1917, with the debt slightly over $4,000,000,000, the Second Liberty Bond Act was enacted setting the debt limit at $25,000,000,000. This was just prior to this country's entrance into the World War and fiscal experts knew that great expenses would be incurred and that an increased public debt would be inevitable. When the armistice was signed in 1918 the national debt approximated $24,000,000,000. Then on May 31, 1938, the Second Liberty Bond Act was amended at the request of the present administration, raising the debt limit to $45,000,000,000. Now, less than 2 years later, but after more than $8,000,000,000 have been added to the debt, the same administration has dropped the hint that it would appreciate it if Congress would give them an added margin of $5,000,000,000 before public opinion becomes too aroused over the matter of how much this country owes. May I point out that even though this Congress votes to raise the debt limit to $50,000,000,000, we have no assurance that this would be the top figure.

No one can say with certainty what another five or ten billion dollars of debt would do to the credit of our Government. Perhaps we could stand the strain and perhaps we could not. Nobody will deny that somewhere there is a limit, and when that limit is reached, if it has not already been reached, the country will be reduced to the state of financial pauperism.

In questioning Mr. Morgenthau before the House Treasury appropriations subcommittee I endeavored to ascertain if it was the opinion of the Treasury Department that we would be faced with the danger of inflation if we agreed to a $50,000,000,000 or higher debt limit. Mr. Morgenthau replied to my questions by asserting that he thought there would be no danger of inflation with a $50,000,000,000 debt limit, but beyond that he would "take another look." In other words, we can assume that the Secretary of the Treasury would be willing to bring this Nation right up to the very brink of inflation before he would calculate our economic condition. He would take this risk in order to finance further New Deal economic experiments.

In connection with the testimony which Mr. Morgenthau gave before the House Treasury apropriations subcommittee, it might be interesting to bring out this Nation's position in the world silver and gold market at the present time. Being especially interested in this problem, I endeavored to find out, in the hearings, if the United States is still buying gold and silver, which we do not need, at boom prices. I attempted to bring out whether this Nation is still playing the part of a yokel boy who would buy the Brooklyn Bridge if it was gilded.

I asked Mr. Morgenthau if the purchasing volume of gold was on the way up or on the way down. Mr. Morgenthau replied that it varied, but pointed out that since 1934 we have been buying all the gold offered us at $35 an ounce whether we wanted to or not. At the same time, we are buying silver at 71 cents an ounce although the world price is 35 cents an ounce. We will continue to buy silver until it reaches $1.29 an ounce, or until it reaches one-quarter of the total monetary stock which, according to the Secretary of the Treasury, will never be reached.

In 1934, this Nation had $4,000,000,000 worth of gold and 690,000,000 ounces of silver. Today we have over $17,000,000,000 worth of gold hidden in holes in the ground throughout the United States, and 2,900 000,000 ounces of silver which the law also counts as reserve money. Last year alone, we paid foreigners well over $3,000,000,000 for gold and silver we did not need. Since January 1934, we have paid foreign nations $11,025,000,000 for silver and gold, not an ounce of which we had any use for. The amount we paid last year for foreign bullion was approximately $800,000,000 greater than our entire merchandise imports. We can use imports such as rubber, coffee, tin, silks, spices, and minerals, but at the present time, bullion is nothing more or less than a white elephant of preponderant proportions.

Although the United States holds approximately 65 percent of the world's gold supply, the Treasury goes right on spending $35 an ounce for gold, and double the world price for silver, only to sink these metals in the ground.

The reason I have gone into this situation as brought out in the Treasury hearings is that this huge excess reserve of $5,500,000,000 has tremendous inflationary possibilities. With no change in our present reserve requirements in the price of silver or gold, or in the amount of certificates issued, the $5,500,000,000 of excess reserve can support double the present bank deposits or check-book money. Should there develop an increase in the volume of check-book money without a similar increase in the supply of goods and services offered, the domestic value of our dollar would undergo a shrinkage, damaging to holders of savings deposits, life insurance, and wage earners that would have a telling effect on the entire economic life of the Nation. This situation is, to say the least, economically unhealthy, and yet we see no remedy in the offing. The Federal Reserve Board has publicly announced itself helpless to control this inflationary potentiality.

However, this is but one of the financial ills with which this Nation is stricken, and my purpose at this time is to ask for consideration of my bill establishing a fact-finding committee to study the national debt limit and the peak which it can reach with safety.

President Roosevelt, in his Budget message, declared that the public debt is not $42,000,000,000, as published by the Treasury Department, but some $7,000,000,000 less than that amount. He based his reduction on the fact that the Treasury holds tangible assets in gold and in stock of Government-owned corporations. This is mere sleight-of-hand bookkeeping, however, for he failed to point out that these same Government corporations have outstanding obligations of their own which are fully guaranteed by the Treasury, in an amount approximately equal to the assets in question.

This, then, constitutes an additional direct and positive debt amounting to over $1,600,000,000 on account of annual gratuities that have been contracted for to be paid by the United States Housing Authority under the Housing Act. Further, there is approximately $6,000,000,000 of contingent liabilities where the Government has guaranteed the bonds of different Government corporations. In addition to that amount, there are huge sums of contracts entered into by various local housing authorities which the Federal Government has guaranteed and is responsible for. It is impossible to tell at this time where we stand on these liabilities. The Government also has an obligation under the Social Security Act, title II, which has been estimated at $10,000,000,000.

Added to these items are such examples of New Deal budgeteering as the mystic innovation of subtracting the bookkeeping payments of the Treasury, to the old-age reserve account, from both sides of the ledger to make both income and outgo smaller by some $500,000,000. Put all these items where they belong and the total estimated deficit for this year is around $9,700,000,000, including debt retirement. The total income will be about $5,700,000,000, thus leaving a net deficit of approximately $4,000,000,000, and placing the administration in the position of far exceeding the debt limit.

Mr. Chairman, to my mind the administration's eighth successive deficit Budget is not only imbued with lighter-than-air methods of bookkeeping, but it is a cruelly disillusioning document whose only purpose is to fool the public into believing the Government is operating within its means. The 1941 Budget is one of the greatest tragedies ever to be foisted on our people. It is a "beggarly account of empty boxes."

The House is to be congratulated for its efforts to bring economy back into vogue, in spite of adverse recommendations by the administration. Let us continue to give future appropriation measures the same careful scrutiny and paring the House has given the appropriation measures already considered. Each dollar we save takes us farther away from the present debt limit and the possibility of raising it to $50,000,000,000.

This Congress must untangle the presto-chango type of budgeteering resorted to by this administration. This Congress must continue to give impetus to the economy tide that it may run deep and cleanse off the spendthrift barnacles which today cling to the hull of the ship of state. No increase in the debt limit should be considered until every unnecessary and excessive item in the 1941 Budget has been eliminated.

Too long has the country gone under the slogan of "spend and lend." We must unfurl the banner of "save for security." [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROSS].

Mr. GROSS. Mr. Chairman, 150 years ago in my county, York County, Pa., cigars were first made in this country. Since that time the business has steadily grown until their cigars have gone all over the world. Those communities have thrived and built large churches and schools.

On Tuesday of this week, due to the wage and hour law, the last cigar factory in one of those important towns closed its doors, throwing its last 200 employees on the rolls of relief or public charity.

These towns and communities in my congressional district where cigars have been made for more than 150 years have grown and been recognized throughout the United States for their thrift and industry and their high standard of living. The banks have prospered as is evident to everyone who comes into the community. Churches and schools have grown likewise. The 200 people thrown out of work this week when the last factory in Craley closed its doors because of the Wage and Hour Act will—many of them—become public charges because of their age and the fact there is no other industry nearby to absorb them.

One factory that paid in 1939 more than $25,000 in Federal taxes has no assurance that it can continue in operation for any length of time. This is just about the end of a one-time great industry covering a large section of York County. Many of these towns will now become ghost towns simply because of governmental interference with an industry in which thousands were employed and earned honest and honorable livelihood.

Recently the United States Department of Labor issued a permit to learners in this industry. Just why they issued permits to learners in an industry that they are closing up is a question for the Department to answer themselves. Thousands of men and women were denied the right of apprenticeship through recent years because of the Wage and Hour Act and have thus been consigned to the ranks of common labor with the result that today we find ourselves short of skilled mechanics in practically every trade. What the Federal Government should do rather than put people out of work is to leave those who can and would work alone.

Recently the American Youth Congress was flooded with literature definitely declaring that the work that youth could get was too fatiguing. Setting up statistics they showed that many of the high-school girl graduates finally had to do domestic work. Instead of the Government belittling the very things that have made America great, they should be teaching the youth today the dignity of labor and the fact that it is every youth's common obligation to work, whatever his hands find to do. No youth has a claim to a soft job, but he is entitled to it if he can get it.

It was never the intent of the founding fathers that the Government should be interested in every individual and keep them. It is the people's duty to keep the Government. If there is one thing that youth needs today it is to be disciplined and not wet-nursed. There still are opportunities in America for those young people who have the fortitude to run against the stream. They are the only ones who really get anywhere finally, and they are the ones who believe that anything that is worth doing is worth doing well.

The young man or woman who is willing to work and takes a pride in doing that work well will not need a paternalistic Government to be looking after him all the time.

I have on my desk this morning a bill asking for an appropriation to build farm houses and redig wells throughout the South, setting forth the dilapidated condition of what they term "the rural slums." Most emphatically I am against the Federal Government spending money in this fashion. The facts are these houses in the Cotton Belt have not just gone to pieces now. And if the wells are too close to the houses or too far away they are exactly where those people dug them.

Not many years ago when cotton still was "king" the cotton farmers came into York County and purchased our mules, paying anywhere from $150 to $500 per head, and they could just as well have been building houses for themselves, or at least keeping them in repair, as spending money for mules as they did. The practice in my county is if a farmer's house needs repair he repairs it. If he has no money to pay someone else to do it he generally gets at it and does it himself, and after all that is the honorable way to do things.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SPRINGER].

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, may I take the time of this great body for a few minutes to express a fear which now possesses my entire being, one which has not come upon me in haste, but it is a fear which has developed throughout the entire session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and which grave fear is that the staggering appropriations which are sought for various agencies and departments of government, when the Treasury is entirely empty and we are operating on borrowed money will eventually rush us into bankruptcy.

We will not forget that we appropriated the vast sum of $953,360,249 at the first session of this Congress as our Naval appropriation. That huge sum so appropriated was the all-time high during peace times. We are now confronted with the present bill, which comes before us wherein we are asked to appropriate the staggering sum of $966,772,878 for the Navy Department for the year 1941.

We are not engaged in war. We must avoid any participation in Europe's wars. The people of this Nation do not want any participation in this war across the ocean. We are a peace-loving Nation. It is our desire that we keep our boys and men in the United States of America—and I now think of approximately 30,000 of the fine boys and men in my congressional district, all of military age, who would be required to answer the call in case of our involvement in this war. We must keep out of this war, and I will use every effort of my own to prevent it.

We must not be unmindful that we have our own problems which must be solved. We are in debt to the extent of more than $42,000,000,000. The appropriation of $1,100,000,000 has already been made at this session with which to pay the interest on this staggering debt.

We have approximately 10,000,000 of our people who are unemployed, and many of whom are hungry, some of whom are without proper clothing, and a vast number of whom are poorly housed and sheltered. This is one of our problems. We must secure jobs for the unemployed, and it is our duty to care for the needy of our country. This problem comes first. This problem is of greater importance than the vast increase of our Navy at a time when it is already one of the most powerful in the world.

We must not forget that we have a highly important problem in agriculture which must be solved. The policy of restricting farm production in the central portion of our Nation, while at the same time our Government is sanctioning and aiding in the reclamation of untold numbers of additional acres which will be placed under cultivation, is a disastrous policy. Imports which are of a competitive character are further injuring our farmers and their business. And we have the policy which must be solved, which directly affects labor and industry in our land. The policy of permitting imports which are directly competitive with our own production in this country have injured both labor and industry. These problems must be solved—they must be solved in the interest of our own people. They cannot be solved by the endless spending of huge sums of money. How many new battleships, destroyers, submarines, and what not are provided in this bill? Battleships larger than any heretofore constructed are contemplated. A nice big target for a well-timed bomb and it would all be over.

One of the items contained in this bill is the sum of $3,000,000 for dredging the harbor of Guam. This item appears with sordid innocence in this measure. Guam is located approximately 6,000 miles from San Francisco and it would be quite impossible to defend that island. It is likewise located only 1,700 miles from the Philippine Islands, which we seek to relinquish. It is located approximately 1,500 miles from Japan. This appropriation for harbor construction at Guam was defeated during the first session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, and I hope it will be overwhelmingly defeated at this session. If we make a grant of money for harbor construction at Guam, then we will soon be called upon to appropriate many, many millions of dollars for the fortification of Guam. That will not be all because we will soon be asked to appropriate funds with which to construct an air base on that far-removed island which would cost many addition millions of dollars. While this initial appropriation appears to be insignificant insofar as the amount which is involved, yet the added sums which will surely follow are those which must concern all of us. There is the added danger of our involvement in a foreign war because of our participation in the proposed work at the harbor of Guam, and should we be called upon to fortify it, I shudder at the result which might follow.

I urge that this appropriation for the harbor of Guam be defeated by the House. If you pass this unnecessary appropriation, the day will come when regret will be your response to all who make inquiry about it.

Let us look upon this appropriation in the light of our economic needs at home. Let us stagger the building of a Navy over a period of years, not immediately—not for war, but for peace! Let us save the money which is so sorely needed for our own people at home—and let us first care for the people of the United States of America. [Applause.]

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRADLEY].

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, we have under consideration today the naval appropriation bill. I intend to discuss a matter of vital concern to the defense of this country, the infiltration of communism into our merchant marine, which is an auxiliary—a most important auxiliary—of our Navy in times of national emergency or war. On the last day of the special session last fall I was appointed to serve on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Through the press and testimony before the Dies committee I had read and heard about the serious infiltration of communism into the personnel of our merchant marine, not only on salt water but on the Great Lakes as well. I had heard that Communists were in control of the National Maritime Union, an affiliate of the C. I. O., of which union a great many seamen on salt and fresh water are members and which union is now conducting an extensive membership campaign on the Great Lakes. Motivated by a desire to learn more about this reported condition and desirous of learning more about the important question of the defenses of the Panama Canal and of the necessity for a third set of locks at the Canal, I made a trip to Panama just prior to the opening of this session.

My trip was made on the new steamship Ancon of the Panama Line, owned by a Government corporation, the Panama Railroad. The Ancon is one of three new vessels owned by the Panama Railroad and is one of the latest units of our merchant marine. I understand these three boats represent an investment of $13,000,000 and, I am happy to learn, were paid for out of the earnings of the Panama Railroad and do not represent the result of an additional deficit appropriation by the Congress. I have been informed these vessels are the tangible result of an extensive study of safety at sea conducted by a board of experts appointed after the disaster to the Morro Castle. Many exhaustive tests of safety devices and other factors promoting safety at sea were studied and those found worth while were incorporated in the design of the Ancon and her sister ships.

In addition, it is my understanding that our Navy experts were fully and freely consulted and collaborated in the design with the thought in mind that in the unfortunate event of war these ships could better serve as auxiliaries to our Navy. During the last World War the great difficulty and delay that was occasioned by our efforts to employ our merchant marine as auxiliaries came about through the imperative necessity of providing them with protective armament. It was found that, even though the antisubmarine guns were available, they could not be mounted on the ships without considerable reinforcement of the ship's structure being required, which, of course, meant considerable delay. So these boats have been reinforced in advance and space for armament provided. In addition, being equipped with greater safety devices, more watertight bulkheads, more automatic fire doors, and so forth, being equipped with fuel tanks which give them a 10,000-mile range, being faster than average for their size, they are truly an effective addition to our merchant marine in peacetime and an effective addition to our naval auxiliaries in times of trouble. Their accommodations for passengers are splendid, the food is excellent. In many cases in the past the crew has not been provided with either good quarters or good food. No man can do his work or his duty if he has not had an opportunity for adequate rest and relaxation in adequate, clean, healthy quarters or when he is hungry. Therefore, I was glad to see that the crew on these boats had been provided with such living conditions. I have been connected with boats and seamen on the Great Lakes for the past 28 years, yet I have never seen quarters better than those provided for the crew on the Ancon.

Mr. Chairman, some interesting things happened on that trip that have since aroused my interest to an even greater extent. I had hardly been in my stateroom 5 minutes before my room steward brought in and introduced to me the National Maritime Union delegate on the boat. It appears that the union has an official delegate on boats on which the union has its members. He not only invited but practically demanded that I talk to the crew. He informed me that on the preceding trip Senators DANAHER and SCHWARTZ had been aboard and talked to the crew. I was glad of the opportunity, more especially when I heard Mr. DANAHER had been booed during his speech. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] was likewise on board and similarly invited to address the crew.

During the ensuing 10 days we were at sea I had studied the crew at every opportunity. It is my sincere belief that most of them are as loyal, red-blooded, 100-percent Americans as I had known and admired, and with whom I had been so intimately and favorably connected so long on the Great Lakes.

When the committee came to get me the night of their meeting I was in conference with the chief engineer discussing some of the mechanical features of the ship and hence asked him if he did not care to join me at the meeting which he did. I presume, from the size of the meeting which was held in a thwartship hallway, just aft of the galley, that most members of the crew who were not on duty were present. The meeting was presided over by the delegate, one Al Rothbart, and was very orderly and businesslike. Several resolutions were adopted, as I recall, and some assessments voted. In particular, I recall they adopted a resolution opposing the further sale or transfer of American ships to foreign registry in violation of the spirit, at least, of the Neutrality Act, with which stand I am in accord and so stated later. In introducing me, the chairman made some rather disparaging remarks about vessel owners in general and with mistreatment of seamen in the past by such owners. Then, in effect, he stated he was not only glad to have me there because I was a member of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and, as such, could better understand at first hand their problems but also because I was at present, "according to my record," which he said they had checked, or had been the owner of the Bradley Transportation Co.; in other words, I was one of those devilish shipowners to which he has just been referring. Now, Mr. Chairman, I talked to those men for about 20 minutes principally about Americanism. In answer to the introduction, I informed the men that while I was very proud of the fact that it was my father who had organized the Bradley Transportation Co., while he had collaborated in the development of the self-unloading type of bulk freighter on the Great Lakes, and while I was proud of the fact that the largest boat now sailing fresh water bears his name, I had only been an employee of the line, and that I had never owned a share of stock or any other financial interest in it in my life, and that I had severed all connection with the company February 1, 1938, before I announced my candidacy for Congress.

But, Mr. Chairman, I did tell that group that if the stories I had heard about supposed communistic control of their union were true, they, the members themselves, had better rid themselves of such un-American domination and do it promptly before they lost the respect of loyal American citizens. I told them further that if there did happen to be any in that crew who did not believe in our form of government or who preferred some one or other of the European philosophies of government, I would suggest that they might get the first boat abroad and have an opportunity to manifest their enthusiasm by fighting for their pet form of "ism."

Now, Mr. Chairman, what has happened since then. The National Maritime Union has a bimonthly publication known as The Pilot. In the next issue of this magazine I am quoted as "owner, or former owner, of the Bradley Transportation Co." Again, and to this I take vigorous exception, in the following issue appears a picture taken of me by a crew member during my speech. My room steward sent me the picture which I hold up here taken from the January 26 issue. You will note the heading at the top of the page in large type "Stop U. S. Ship Sales"—below it is my picture. You will note, and this is just as it was sent to me, it has been carefully cut across the bottom of the picture so that only the exclamation "Stand fast!" appears together with my name. Now, later, this full issue of the publication has been handed to me and you will note the same picture and under it these words "Stand fast! 'Hold on to your hiring halls at any cost!' Congressman BRADLEY tells a crew meeting on the steamship Ancon en route to Panama." Mr. Chairman, that is a deliberate misrepresentation. I made no such statement—I did not mention their hiring halls which I understand is one of their "big moments" at this very time. I want the seamen of the Great Lakes for whom I have such a high regard to know that I made no such statement and that I do not approve of them as I have been informed they are at present conducted. The N. M. U. is conducting a drive to establish hiring halls on the Great Lakes and I believe this is a flagrant attempt to make some Great Lakes seamen believe that I have endorsed them. I most emphatically do not at this time.

What is a hiring hall? It is a place through which mates and engineers hire their seamen for their crew. Mr. Chairman, in sailing, as in every other line of work, experience counts for a great deal, not only in efficiency but also in the safe operation of a ship. Naturally, seniority has always been respected by captains and chief engineers, and I want here to pay my respects to those men. Mr. Chairman, there is no line of endeavor in my knowledge in which men are entrusted, under their sole care and under their complete responsibility and subject to their sole judgment—theirs alone—with a more valuable piece of property commensurate with the amount of salary they receive than a captain, or master, and chief engineer of a steamboat. Here is the Ancon, over $4,000,000 worth of iron and steel and machinery and engineering talent, together with hundreds of human lives, under the sole command, judgment, and operating skill of Captain Swinson and Chief Engineer Peterson while at sea.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been informed, on what I believe to be good authority, that Communists are conducting a concerted effort to secure members for their party and that it is their program to have one or more members on every vessel in the American merchant marine, with the probable thought in mind of sabotage in the event of trouble with Russia, which I consider remote, and also to tie up our merchant marine and so prevent shipment of arms, ammunition, and other needed supplies to enemies of the Soviet Union. I am informed they are conducting a systematic membership drive on the Great Lakes right now while the seamen are at home, away from their shipmates, and mainly unemployed during the usual winter lay-up period. I understand there is an operative in my own neighboring city of Alpena, Mich. I warn seamen on the Great Lakes to avoid these men. I warn seamen everywhere to avoid them—they would just as soon sell you down the river as not to satisfy their own greed and get your membership dues and assessments to carry on their nefarious schemes.

In these hiring halls they endeavor to have one of their henchmen in charge. When a call comes in for seamen, they are not selected in order of application nor in order of seniority—the mate or engineer is told the men will be down. Later a "fellow traveler" is selected quietly and told where to report, and another boat is "all set" with a Communist aboard. How can any Member of this body or any good citizen of this country support or advocate hiring halls conducted thus? Until this mode of action is changed I will have nothing to do with it—until seniority rights are respected I will have none of it. That I was deliberately misquoted, maliciously so, I not only again show you the picture clipped out so as to carefully cut off the remarks I did not make, and which evidently my steward knew I did not make, but also I quote from a letter received from the engineer on the boat, as follows:

> I noticed your picture in an issue of the National Maritime Union Pilot, this voyage, and see they have you quoted as saying in your speech to the crew of the steamship Ancon that they should hold onto their hiring halls at all cost. This proved our contention that you might be misquoted, knowing your views on the subject, I am taking the liberty of calling this to your attention.
> Since I attended the meeting with you and we had no previous conversation on the subject I know no reference was made to the method of hiring seamen.
> Your speech was more in the nature of a patriotic pep talk on merchant-marine affairs. It seems to me that they are giving the hiring hall idea publicity at your expense and using a very unfair method of doing it.

Mr. Chairman, the day following my speech on the Ancon I talked to a number of members of the crew. They told me they were glad Congress knew that their union was being run and dominated by Communists and that they felt helpless to do anything about it. They knew that members of the Communist Party were on their ship, that they knew who they were and that they felt certain the delegate Rothbart was one. I have since been told that he is what is known as a courier and that at one time he was on the New York to Havre, France, run. A "courier" is one whose duty it is to carry their money and confidential papers back and forth between their international agents. Mr. Chairman, it is time to wake up, it is time to rid the American Merchant Marine of those whose master is Stalin in Russia; it is time that this Congress gives definite tangible support to the thousands upon thousands of loyal American seamen in their efforts to thwart this menace to their source of livelihood.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Vermont the balance of our time, 12 minutes.

JUST COMMON SENSE

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not attempting to make a speech. I would like to think out loud about this naval appropriation business. It has been a headache for me for 3 years and more. I am not a pacifist. I know I am no naval expert or strategist. I make no claims as such. I speak as one who has a lot to learn and knows it, but some things I hear do not make sense even to a landlubber. Perhaps I overestimate the importance of what I may think about it, anyway, but here are a few random thoughts for what they are worth.

In the first place, may I say that I do not wish to be misunderstood with respect to my position concerning sufficient appropriations for the Navy. I am for reasonable and necessary preparedness first, last, and all the time. I will vote to appropriate every cent the expenditure of which can be justified as necessary for our immediate or early use in order properly to defend this country now or in the future. I have so voted in supporting the bill before you in committee.

I will not vote to endorse the authorization or the appropriation of expenditures for construction that cannot be made for years to come merely because it seems to some people an opportune time to take advantage of the war-furor-engendering emotionalism.

There is no emergency now that has not at least existed in futuro for the last 4 years. This proposed naval-expansion program, if what we are now told is so, should have been presented from 4 to 7 years ago, in view of what it is alleged the Navy then knew with respect to probable world conditions.

THE SUGGESTED PROGRAM

The program now proposed might well have been suggested 4 years ago, if at all, if so urgent as is insisted. The necessities now urged as so compelling are very little if any more urgent than in 1935 or 1939, if we can believe what we have heard heretofore.

The war in Europe is not our war, and the situation has been threatening for years. Our major responsibility is to prepare ourselves for defense. That has been our major problem. It is not new.

We have heretofore authorized and appropriated money for a program which cannot be completed for 4 years at the earliest—some say 7 years. Why be excited into further action by an alleged emergency that does not exist any more now than for 4 years.

Speaking generally, the facilities for naval construction are taxed to their utmost—yards, docks, ways, machine shops are filled with ships, men, and material.

There is no place, unless we make it, or them, where we could do a thing looking toward really accomplishing very much along the line of construction for the new program.

Every qualified ship mechanic is busy on the old program and will be for from 4 to 7 years. The number of apprentices is limited. The man supply of competent shipbuilders is utilized to the last man today.

SHORTAGE OF FACILITIES

With respect to the shortage of facilities and men, you might read pages 661 and the following of the hearings. Among other statements, you will find these:

Admiral VAN KEUREN. There is still some shortage of draftsmen in the navy yards particularly, and some private yards, and every effort is being made to train draftsmen by taking young college men and giving them an intensive course right on the job under the instruction of a competent man, and that is proceeding very satisfactorily in all navy yards and many private yards.

Mr. CALDWELL. At what stage of construction do you find the bottlenecks, usually?

Mr. VAN KEUREN. They begin to show up in the machine shops about a year from the receipt of the contract, when they begin work on such things as auxiliary machinery and turbines, the production of gears, and so on, because the capacity of practically all machine shops is limited.

Mr. CALDWELL. What you really need is some more navy yards, is it not?

Admiral ROBINSON. Yes, sir; we need about five or six more at this particular moment.

Mr. CALDWELL. And those navy yards ought to be placed in some other part of the United States, to get around the congestion of the short scope of the Atlantic coast, don't you think, Admiral?

Admiral ROBINSON. That undoubtedly would have to be done; yes, sir. The question of navy yards, of course, is like everything else—you need a whole lot of them at certain times and you do not need so many of them at other times. Right now we could use about twice as many as we have got, and, as you say, they would have to be placed in other ports of the United States that are not bottlenecks on labor right now.

Admiral VAN KEUREN. I was going to say one big factor in using shift work is that you cannot get proper supervision. The number of men available for supervisors is limited. You have to have a highly skilled man and one who can handle a gang of men to make a good supervisor out of him.

And we have found at the navy yards—and I have just come from one a few months ago—such men simply are not available. It takes time to build them up. If we had a war emergency for 3 or 4 years, probably you could train up these men, but most navy yards and private yards—I have talked to a great many of them, and their managers tell us that the lack of supervisors is one vital defect in using shift work. Furthermore, you cannot work as well under artificial light and under the conditions they have to work under at night as they can work in the daytime.

Another factor is in certain trades there are actually shortages of skilled men. Take the ship fitters, the mold loftsmen, and even the coppersmiths and pipe fitters—up to the time I left Philadelphia there were shortages in those trades. Those shortages are being met by training young men, helpers and apprentices, as fast as we can train them.

Mr. CALDWELL. That shortage is being kept a deep, dark secret outside of Philadelphia, though, and the shipyard centers. I have no doubt in my mind if it were made known that you wanted competent men for that work you would be swamped with applications.

* * * * * * *

Admiral VAN KEUREN. No, sir. I have had something to do with that. We advertised all over the United States; we have gone out in the shipbuilding districts of the Great Lakes, and gone to the South, and everybody, all the labor boards, have had the same story to tell—that men cannot qualify for the positions which we want them to fill. You will get plenty of applications, but when you investigate them, the men have actually had no experience in that trade. We have had men to apply for "loftsmen" and when we investigate their experience we find they were loftsmen in a clothing factory, or something of that sort. They do not understand the specifications for these trades.

Mr. MCLEOD. What efforts are being made to build up those trades—any?

Admiral VAN KEUREN. Efforts are being made in the shipyards themselves by taking men who have helpers' experience and increasing the number of apprentices. That is the only satisfactory way you can get skilled men.

ADMIRAL LEAHY'S STATEMENT

As late as March 27, 1939, Admiral Leahy told the subcommittee that the estimates of the Navy Department, conforming to the usual procedure, were prepared after a detailed study of the Navy's responsibility for national defense and its present means of meeting that responsibility. That is what he said. It is significant. The conclusions reached as a result of the study, and as approved by the Secretary of the Navy, he said, were presented to the various bureaus and offices of the Department to be used as a basis for their detailed plans and Budget estimates.

"The operating force plan," said he, together with the "assignment of vessels in the organization of seagoing forces of the United States" and the "fleet employment plan," are derived from this study and prepared by the Chief of Naval Operations. The operating-force plan sets forth the vessels and aircraft to be kept in commission and operated during the year, and the organization of the fleet marine force, as required to fulfill the mission imposed by the current approved policies.

All items in the current estimates which have to do with operating the forces afloat and providing them with personnel are based directly upon the requirements of the operating-force plan and are essential to the accomplishment of the plan. Any reduction in the funds allowed for these items would therefore result in curtailment of the plan and of the forces afloat.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The operating-force plan covers all auxiliaries and subsidiaries in the way of shore stations.

Admiral LEAHY. That is correct. The operating-force plan includes all auxiliaries, shore stations, aircraft, personnel, and all the elements of naval power.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. And it is necessary that the shore facilities keep up with the seagoing operations.

Admiral LEAHY. Yes; the shore facilities are as necessary as the equipment used in the operations.

Funds requested in the present estimates for shore facilities which exist for the support and maintenance of the forces afloat are directly related to the requirements of the projected operating force plan and of future plans, so far as they can be foreseen.

The political conditions in the world today have not improved since last year. All the major powers are continuing to expend their maximum efforts toward rearming on both land and sea. It is very evident that the present moment is not one when the United States can safely reduce the present extent of its preparations for national defense without jeopardizing our national security. We should continue to maintain our existing national-defense establishments at their highest efficiency, complete as soon as possible and practicable the projects now underway to improve or augment the existing establishments, and provide those features which are still lacking and which are vital to the efficiency of the national defense at sea.

The United States may be brought suddenly face to face with a situation that it had no part in creating and over which it may have no control, and for that reason, in determining estimates for the Navy, conditions in the world on all sides of us must be considered. The strength of our Navy as compared with the strength of the navies of other great naval powers must be given serious consideration.

In view of the rapidly changing alinement of European understandings and alliances, and the agreements as to community of interests between nations of Europe and Asia, it is essential that America should take steps toward an assurance of security even against possible alliances, and without depending upon assistance from any foreign source.

NO REQUEST FOR EXPANSION OF FACILITIES

It is interesting to note that no request for the appropriation of funds for the expansion of facilities was made in the 1940 application. With regard to this matter Admiral Leahy went on to say:

The estimate figures submitted by the various agencies of the Navy Department have already been pruned to a minimum consistent with what are considered the needs for reasonable national security.

Please take note, "the needs for reasonable national security," he said:

It would therefore, in my opinion, be jeopardizing national security to reduce the present number of vessels and aircraft in active service, to fail to man the fleet effectively with officers and men, to delay the authorized ship-building and aircraft-building programs, or to fail to build up the shore establishments and reserve stocks in support of the fleet.

We took him at his word.

It is my opinion that the prospect of international disturbance in the near future fully warrants expediting the authorized naval-building program as much as is practicable with the facilities that are available or that can be made available.

We went along with him.

These estimates, however—

He said—

do not contemplate the provision of additional facilities.

Mr. PLUMLEY. May I interrupt at this point? Admiral Leahy, do I understand that in your judgment the existing situation does not justify the provision of additional facilities for expediting the authorized naval-building program as much as is practicable with the facilities that are available or that can be made available? These estimates, however, do not contemplate the provision of additional facilities for expediting the authorized naval-building program.

Admiral LEAHY. That was not my intention. The present situation would, in my opinion, warrant an expansion of facilities wherever such expansion would be advantageous to our program; but my statement was that this appropriation does not request funds for expansion of facilities.

The existing naval personnel and material are correctly measured by the degree to which they satisfy the requirements of the current operating force plant, and by the extent to which they are adapted to adjust themselves to cover future similar plans. It is in this light that the present situation will be reviewed briefly and it is with the related necessities in mind that the present estimates have been prepared.

Future plans and related necessities, covered satisfactorily in 1939, or so we were given to understand, and the possibility of an alleged emergency was right out in front in each and every discussion, on and off the record. So what?

So it is obvious that facilities and trained shipbuilders from the carpenter to the expert radio engineer are just nonexistent and in such number as even to suggest the impossibility of accomplishing anything with a construction program, were one adopted or authorized.

There is no sense in tying up a lot of money on a program that cannot be carried out; not to say for one for which there is no present necessity.

It will take, as I have said again and again, 4 to 7 years to complete the present program. The war in Europe will be over before that time. Or will it? Or, says somebody, we will be in it. Well, supposing we are in it by that time; of what use will this proposed program be in that event? None of the ships, or at least only a few, contemplated in the proposed program can or would be constructed. That, in short, is the situation as I see it.

PROGRAM SHOULD BE COMPLETED

The thing to do is to complete as rapidly as may be the program which 2 and 4 years ago we were advised or given to understand was sufficient to meet any and all emergencies, present or future; do not forget that.

On the other hand, I am not so sure—and assumedly neither is the Navy—that the present program should be carried cut in particularity as laid down. A good many competent people think, and with reason, that two of the 45,000-ton battleships is enough of that type for all time. And, by the way, construction of these has not commenced, as you and I understand the meaning of the word "construction."

There are those who contend that the next great naval battle will be fought in the air. Maybe so. That being so, if so, suggests that certainly two 45,000-ton battleships at from $75,000,000 up are enough for targets for enemy airplanes.

As I have said, I repeat, that since one 55,000- to 60,000-ton battleship can and would defeat two 45,000-tonners, if we are going to build battleships we better have one of the bigger type than two of the smaller, especially since the larger would cost, we are told, not more than two-thirds as much as the two smaller.

If you can build a 55,000- to 60,000-ton battleship for $100,000,000 to $120,000,000, that can overpower two 45,000-tonners, why spend $160,000,000 to $180,000,000 on the two? Why not save money and get a real champion?

Cannot get through the Canal, they say. The answer is found in the fact that by the time that any of the big ships are constructed and launched it is very probable that the new locks at Panama will have been completed. The locks as contemplated will permit easy passage of bigger ships than any we have heard talked about, or they should not be built. That is as plain as your nose.

In the present depleted state of the Treasury we should not be induced by any enthusiasm, superinduced by war fever, to run hog wild in the authorization of or appropriation of money for the building of ships that cannot be constructed, anyway, because of lack of men and facilities wherewith to accomplish the task to which we set ourselves. It just does not make sense.

CUT TO THE BONE

So, I say, we should cut to the bone every appropriation sought to be justified by an emergency that does not exist, for the expenditure of money for the construction of additional ships that we cannot build and do not now need.

The necessary millions for necessary defense should be forthcoming. The taxpayers will so agree. But not a cent for gestures, nor a cent to permit a group of we-must-police-the-world people to plunge us into an orgy of spending, unjustified, unwarranted, and indefensible under existing economic conditions. The sad commentary that can truthfully be made is that if we do not change economic conditions in this country by putting a stop—and now—to the reckless spending of the taxpayers' money like drunken sailors, we will have nothing to defend.

I may be wrong. It has happened, and may again, but it seems to me that taking advantage of the "keep out of war" state of mind of the American people, the ammunition and munition makers, the steel fabricators, the airplane manufacturers, the money lenders, together—may I say it—with the Commander in Chief, have undertaken to go "hog wild" on a spending spree for building up a Navy program, which, in my judgment, is not required by the United States in order properly to defend itself or to enforce the Monroe Doctrine. As with a family, so also with the Nation; what we would like to have, could we afford it, and what we must have and can afford, are matters for careful consideration.

For more than 3 years now I have been listening to the testimony of naval experts and have consulted authorities recognized as such, outside the Navy. Reduced to a brief statement the situation stripped of all its scareheads and propaganda, as I see it, adds up to the fact which the American people are entitled to know, that for reasons outside of our own situation we are relatively secure in the Pacific, even without a Pacific fleet. There may come a time when we may think it wisdom to build and maintain a Pacific fleet. However, we are today not secure in the Caribbean, though we are fairly so in the north Atlantic, if the experts are to be relied upon.

In this bill we are appropriating necessary money for continuing the construction of two 45,000-ton battleships, which, when launched, will be the fastest battleships in the world, even faster than any heavy cruisers now afloat, or so they say.

I feel that if we were to appropriate the money, now, for any more of the 45,000-ton type we would do it knowing it would be from 5 to 7 years before one of them could be launched, during which time the type itself might become obsolescent, if not obsolete. History repeats itself.

Dr. Oscar Parks, editor of Janes Fighting Ships, states, as quoted in Esquire for December 1939—

> That naval designers now regard a displacement of 50,000 or 55,000 tons as the minimum on which it is possible to combine sufficiently powerful guns, an adequate antiaircraft battery, satisfactory deck and belt armor, an effective protection against torpedoes.

The big battleship is not only a more efficient fighting machine and a better tactical unit but also, ton for ton—and it may be emphasized again that what is being pointed out is not ship-for-ship but ton-for-ton superiority—a cheaper weapon. If we continue to trail Japan in the size of our battleships, Japan may not find it impossible to acquire a real naval strength fully equal to ours. What we may expect is that by the time we have begun work on 45,000-ton ships Japan will be found to have started on 50,000- or 55,000- or 60,000-ton battleships.

The subcommittee had information to the effect that the leading naval powers, in spite of their different strategic needs which have dictated smaller ships, are building even larger and more powerful battleships. The universal adoption by other nations of this principle of larger and more powerful battleships must be founded on sound technical and tactical reasons by experts skilled in the art.

So it seems to me that inasmuch as the proposed capital ships will not and cannot be completed and ready for service until more than 4 years have elapsed, nothing will be lost and definite advantage will be gained by making all such new ships superior in every respect to the pending foreign construction.

IMITATING AND MATCHING OUT OF THE WINDOW

I am definitely of the opinion that the time has arrived for the United States to cease imitating and merely matching foreign nations with respect to the power of battleships. This Nation should take a position with respect to the size and power of battleships, if they are to be built, consistent with the fact that it is the largest, richest, and most powerful nation in the world and hence should make use of its economic strength to protect itself with incomparably more powerful ships and in such numbers as will maintain a preponderance of power over other nations, and thus insure the protection of the United States.

In an article in the Esquire magazine of December 1939 on our naval dilemma certain statements are made which are interesting, to say the least. You will find reference to it and certain quotations therefrom and comments thereon on page 249 of the hearings. For example, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] asked Admiral Robinson if he had read the article and he said he had, then the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] said:

> Mr. SCRUGHAM. Now, I have referred to an article in the Esquire magazine of December 1939 entitled "Our Naval Dilemma." Have you read this article?
> Admiral ROBINSON. Yes, sir.
> Mr. SCRUGHAM. I have no intention of questioning you on anything other than engineering and construction phases of the article. It is stated here:
> "Dr. Oscar Parks, editor of Jane's Fighting Ships, states that naval designers now regard a displacement of 50,000 or 55,000 tons as the minimum on which it is possible to combine sufficiently powerful guns and adequate antiaircraft batteries, satisfactory deck and belt armor, and effective protection against torpedoes."
>
> Do you regard that as a correct statement?
> Admiral ROBINSON. Well, I would say it is relatively correct; or, to be more specific, I think unquestionably you can answer those particular things he mentions better on a big ship than you can on small ones. Or, to put it another way, ton for ton, you can get more speed, or armor, or guns—whichever you happen to want—on a big ship than you can on a small one. I think that is practically axiomatic and pertains to any class of ship which you are talking about.
> POLICY OF THE JAPANESE NAVY ON BATTLESHIP CONSTRUCTION
> Mr. SCRUGHAM. There is another statement discussing the policy of the Japanese Navy:
> "The success of Japan's policy, as far as the United States is concerned, has depended largely on congressional inability to see why one large battleship should be better than two smaller ones—an inability which has, at times, forced the Navy to build ships even smaller than those we had completed before."
> That probably is a technical question. What have you to say about that?
> Admiral ROBINSON. Of course, what he is referring to there is the fact that up to fairly recent times—I do not know the exact year—Congress did specify the size of ships, either by the actual tonnage, or limit of cost—one or the other, and sometimes both—and that did limit the size of ships.
>
> Mr. SCRUGHAM. But no such limitation now applies in any sense whatever?
> Admiral ROBINSON. There is no such limitation now; no, sir.

Common sense, I say, suggests that many things can happen in the advancement of science in the art of naval construction in the next year or two or three or four, or while we are constructing the two that have been authorized, that cannot be completed for 4 years at least.

COULD NOT BUILD IF TEN BILLIONS WERE APPROPRIATED

Moreover, let me repeat, we are confronted by the fact that we could not presently build any more if we appropriated $10,000,000,000. There are at present, as I have said, no men competent to build a large number of them; there are insufficient facilities for building them. You cannot make the necessary type of naval architect or mechanic over night. All the competent available architects and mechanics are now employed. We have no private or Government yards that are not now, or are not to be choked to capacity with ships in process of construction, actual or contemplated, under the program authorized. Where are they to be built?

It is dumbness for us to be swept off our feet or scared to death by the ghosts of the necessity for unlimited spending for a naval construction for many years ahead of us that just cannot be accomplished.

ARE WE WASTING MONEY AT GUAM?

I am wondering if every cent we spend at Guam or Wake or Midway, except to make them stepping stones in times of peace and to secure the safety of landing planes and the lives of the pilots and crew is not wasted. Do not forget that as we undertake to invest the taxpayers' money we should realize that we have declared our policy with respect to the Philippines. We are out of the Philippines in 1946. Or are we?

Were there to be a war with Japan, which under existing world conditions is not so imminent as some would try to believe, or scare us into thinking, for we want no war with Japan, and Japan really does not want one in which the United States Navy is on the side against Japan. Do not forget that what we would eventually do to Japan is just too bad to contemplate, and Japan knows it, despite all her bluster and big talk, but were war declared or commenced Guam and Wake and Midway would be taken by Japan overnight; everybody knows this, too. We might retake them. We would eventually if we thought they were worth the price we would have to pay; being out of the Philippines?

I am not seriously impressed by all the talk with reference to the alleged defensive necessity for the military fortification of Guam. I am, however, oppressed by a sense of the possibility of a personal responsibility which might attach itself to me for the death of pilots and/or passengers killed at Guam due to my failure to undertake to help try to provide safe landing opportunities. I cannot escape from that thought.

As against this Japanese possibility it is generally agreed, as I have heard stated over and over, that Japan cannot spin a thread offensively against us until and unless she takes Hawaii. She cannot take Hawaii in months, if ever. The only intermediate station for Japan, so naval experts tell us, is Hawaii. Hawaii controls the Pacific; and so long as we continue to make and do make and keep it the American Gibraltar, the impregnable fortress of the Pacific, Japan can bring no war to our shores. That is that! Remember it!

ALASKAN BASES

It is not to be overlooked, however, that as a precautionary measure we should strengthen our Alaskan bases, though, strategically speaking, I have heard it insisted by those who ought to know that the possibility of a successful attack by Japan on the western coast or from a Mexican base may be dismissed as practically impossible of accomplishment.

It is moreover conceded that we will have to defend the Dutch West Indies and the countries of eastern South America and Canada, if we undertake to defend and enforce the Monroe Doctrine, in the interest of our own safety and security, if and when these places are or may be threatened or attacked. Obviously, we will have to do some other things then or before that date in order to defend ourselves, but we will not have to do all of them at once or just now.

Of one thing I am positive, namely, that we need more and better air bases in the Northeast. I also know that we should be glad and willing to spend the necessary money to protect the Panama Canal—and I mean protect it—and ourselves.

I have already said much more in a rambling, disconnected manner than I intended to say when I started. Yet I have only skimmed the subject, or touched the edges, hoping to excite your interest.

I am confident that not a single cent of cut of any appropriation made in the bill under consideration adversely affects the right, power, or our opportunity for the sufficient and complete defense of our country. It admittedly does preclude the unnecessary spending of some of the money that might be experimentally expended were Uncle Sam a Croesus, money mad, or out to shoot up the world on a navy-building spree at the taxpayers' expense.

Let me again reiterate that you cannot fail to observe, if you read the hearings of the last few years, and especially those of last year, that in support of a program covering "what are considered the needs for reasonable national security" in 1939—the Navy's program—"the rapidly changing alinement of European understandings and alliances," and the matter of "security even against possible alliance," and other phases of the world situation were gone into exhaustively by Admiral Leahy.

STRAW-MAN BOGEY OF FOREIGN COALITION

Under what bed was this straw-man coalition bogey hiding at that time? If the statements made to us then were to be relied upon, it follows that the statements now made are not.

SCARECROW OF COALITION

This scarecrow of coalition has a strangely familiar look. He is found on many pages of history and sticks out like a sore thumb again and again in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of days gone by. He is always susceptible of resurrection when it is necessary to try to scare somebody.

This is no time to be scared. It is our business as legislators to keep this country out of war, and one way to do that is to keep our legislative appropriative feet on the ground. The oceans, I assume, are no narrower, and our defenses certainly should not be more inadequate, than when in 1938–39 we accepted and adopted and provided for carrying out a program offered and guaranteed by the Navy to secure us adequate national defense.

NO MILITARISTIC DOMINATION WILL BE TOLERATED

In conclusion I am constrained to say that it is time for some plain talk. It should be understood that we will tolerate no militaristic domination here in the United States, such as obtains in Japan, and we propose to step on its head if and when it shows itself.

We just will not permit any such arrogant assumption of governmental functions and prerogatives on the part of any department of this Government.

Now, nobody takes any exception to the enthusiasm and initiative of the admirals or of the generals with respect to the orderly progress and development of their respective departments, but when they or any of them undertake to dictate to Congress, as some of them are charged with having attempted to do, they are just out of line.

I know that we have the finest Army and the best Navy in the world. Each led by men who are fully and completely competent and trained for commanding such magnificient outfits. I am proud of them, and of their accomplishments and their potentialities, but obviously the time has come to remind some of them politely, but nevertheless emphatically, that despite what they may think with regard to their competency, it nevertheless is a fact, as has been said, that military policy is the province primarily of the civil as distinguished from the military power of the state. It is for the civil power to determine higher ends of state policy and to provide the military power with the instruments necessary to support or if need be to defend the policy so adopted. It is for the soldier to advise as to the sufficiency of those instruments, but the determination of policy is not his province save in a state where the military power is supreme or nearly so, as in Japan.

I hope it will be considered apropos to recall here and now what Napoleon said with respect to the clergy when he was criticized for having imprisoned Pope Pius VII. Said he, "The activities of the clergy must be defined and restricted to their proper sphere, within the church. I will run the state." As to the clergy, "Roi, dans le temple, sujet, a la porte," said he. [Applause.]

The Clerk read the bill down to and including line 6, page 1.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAYBURN.

Rev. J. Luther Neff, pastor of the Wesley Methodist Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God and Spirit Father of mankind, in humility and conscious dependence we bow our spirits before Thee this day. Somehow we do believe that Thou canst help us at the point of our deepest need, doing more abundantly for us than we could possibly ask or think. Therefore in this brief moment of quietness may our inner, better selves give eager welcome to Thy presence. Free us, now, from servitude to selfishness, disobedience, and sin. Challenge us to a deeper faith in Thy power, a more complete trust in Thy love and mercy, and an ever-enlarging service to a terribly needy world. Through our more perfect surrender to the call of Thy spirit, may the glorious freedom of Thy truth become our prized possession; may the sense of spiritual power become our chief reassurance in facing life and responsibility; and may our inner integrity be our highest commendation before men. These things we ask in Christ's name, in whom and through whom Thy nature and purposes stand revealed. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, we have before us today the appropriation bill for the Naval Establishment. The committee have considered with care the estimates and suggestions as they came from the Naval Establishment. I believe the bill merits the support of the entire membership of the House, and I trust that the recommendations of the bill, during the course of its consideration this afternoon, will be approved by this body.

The request of the Navy Department for an appropriation of $954,540,000 for the fiscal year 1940 is a phenomenal peacetime occurrence. This is more money than the Navy spent in any year of its history except during the World War. The appropriations for the Navy under the New Deal have risen from $267,000,000 in 1934 to the present request of $954,540,000 for 1941. Thus, it is apparent that funds requested by the Navy for expenditures have almost tripled during 7 years. In 1934 there were only about 90,000 officers and enlisted men in the Navy. Now we are requested to appropriate funds for a navy of a total force of 145,000 men—an increase of over 50 percent. The Marine Corps is to be increased from 16,000 in 1934 to 25,000 for 1941—again an increase of 50 percent.

To persons who are used to dealing in terms of billions of dollars I suppose that these figures of expenditures for the Navy do not bulk very large. Of course, even with these great increases, our expenditures for the Navy are not as large as those of most of the European countries. But in these increases of appropriations for the Naval Establishment there lurk certain potential dangers. The American people have been peace loving; I doubt whether there is a more peace-loving nation in the world. Our Government has never been dominated by military leaders. But what is going to happen to this country if the expenditures for the Military and Naval Establishments continue to increase at the rate they have during the past few years? Is it not possible that the position of the armed forces in our governmental structure will be changed? Is there not a possibility that when larger and larger funds are appropriated for both the Army and Navy that their significance in American thought and politics will be greatly magnified? Is it possible that there will be a tendency for the officers of these establishments to attain a much more significant position in our national economy? They may even tend to direct, to control, and to dominate general governmental policy.

Of course, you will say that there is no danger of this change taking place at the present time. That is true, for right now there is no such danger. But if the appropriations for these establishments continue to increase at the rate they have been during the last several years, it will not be long until the Army and Navy will be considered the most significant branches of our National Government. The officers in both of these armed forces will have, consequently, a larger and larger part to play in determining the course of general national policy. They will cease then to be the agents, the tools, and the instruments of the people, and may possibly raise themselves in national affairs by gradual degrees so as to become the masters of the people.

Let me make myself clear. I do not mean to imply that there is any subversive or sinister plot on the part of our high naval and military officers. They sincerely believe that what they are doing is absolutely necessary for the national defense. Of course, they are partisan, a word I do not use with any sinister connotation, in their views. They have no personal desires to take the center of the stage and become the dominant force in the determination of policy. Whether or not they have such personal desires is beside the point. Their rise to power in our national economy will follow naturally as a consequence of their increased significance resulting from greater and greater appropriations for their establishments. It would be inevitable, it would be natural, and it would be difficult to stop.

Japan is a fine example of a country that is under the complete control of military factions. An army clique runs the entire government. It determines what foreign and domestic policies will be. It determines what will be the proper method of handling and executing such policies that will be adhered to. In Japan the military establishment is far from being only an agent of the people; it is their complete master. The same situation actually exists in many a Latin American country. I suppose you will call me an alarmist for making these statements. I would rather be labeled an alarmist for doing so than to neglect my duty to point out to you that these possible potentialities might exist for even the peace-loving United States.

We cannot be unmindful of the course pursued by the President at the time of the outbreak of the war in Europe. He immediately found a "limited national emergency" to exist and thereupon took steps to increase the size of the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. The atmosphere of peace was disturbed not only by the memories of the World War but a fear was implicated that a hazardous condition was present. All of us remember the reports that were circulated of periscopes being seen off the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Danger was said to lurk right at our shores. A so-called neutrality patrol was set up to prevent belligerent submarines from refueling off our coasts. Thus the ground was laid for the justification of vastly increased estimates for the national-defense program. My fear is that if the Military and Naval Establishments grow in importance such moves as those which we have already witnessed will be all the more frequent and their effects all the more far reaching.

The increases in our Naval Establishment have been astonishing. The monthly expenditures for the construction of naval vessels was approximately $18,000,000 in 1939. It jumped to about $25,000,000 in 1940. It makes another upward drive in 1941, hitting the high-water mark of $31,000,000. Thus, during the course of 3 years we have witnessed an increase in this one item of almost 100 percent. It seems to me that caution is in order. It seems to me that an impression should be made upon the Naval Establishment that our first objective is the maintenance of peace, and that the expenditures for the Navy can only be justified as the money appropriated represents peaceful purposes.

Attention should be called to the suggested policy advocated by the Navy of a material increase in the complement of men manning the ships. It has been generally considered that our naval vessels should be manned up to 85 percent of their full complement. Since the declaration of the limited emergency there have been those who have urged that the increase of personnel should be up to 100 percent. Apparently this suggested increase was even looked upon by the Navy as excessive, for the estimates ultimately rested on the basis of manning our naval vessels to 89.8 percent of their full complement. Again the war in Europe—the need of a neutrality patrol—the uncertainty of war conditions provided the basis upon which the increase over peacetime strength was advocated. As for myself, I am still convinced that a complement of 85 percent is sufficient.

I feel that I should direct your attention to some of the practices that have been used during the course of the last 7 months in expanding the naval program. To me they indicate either a disregard for democratic processes, or, at best, a weak effort to try to come within the law. They represent the procedure followed in those countries that are dominated by the armed forces. For instance, the policy of having two budgets is subject to much question. You will recall that we have an A budget and a B budget—one, which is supposed to be the ordinary expenditures of the Department, and the other, the so-called B budget, covering allegedly emergency expenditures for the fiscal year 1941 that were supposed to have resulted from the present war situation in Europe and the neutrality patrol. The A budget carried $829,000,000 and the B budget $125,000,000. The B budget items are considered to be temporary. They were supposedly not to include permanent public works. Let us examine them. There is an item of $55,700 intended for the building and equipment of a training school at Norfolk to train enlisted men in specific skilled trades. Your attention is directed to the hearings, which indicate the rather futile efforts that were made not only on this item but on many items to justify their allocation in the B budget, as, for instance, new barracks and officers' quarters in the Canal Zone, new airplane hangars, and others of a similar kind.

There is another point I would like to call to your attention. Last year we appropriated $50,000,000 for public works in the Navy Department, with specific proviso in the appropriation law that these funds would be expended for projects that were previously authorized or were authorized therein. But during the fiscal year 1940 over $7,500,000 have been diverted from projects that were therein authorized and are being used to construct projects that were never authorized by Congress in derogation of the specific language of the appropriation act. The annual maintenance and operating costs of these projects will be $480,000, according to the Navy Department. If it were desirable to undertake the construction of these new projects, why was not Congress consulted? At the time such decisions were made to undertake these projects the House and Senate were sitting. Could it be that the administration was too timid to ask us to authorize the expenditure of funds for these projects? Could it not be possible that they thought we might not approve of these new undertakings? Is this responsible democratic government?

Lastly, I would like to call to your attention a rather unusual phenomenon. Most of us believe that a deficiency appropriation is something that is necessitated by circumstances not existing or not clearly contemplated at the time the original appropriation was requested and approved. It is to fill a deficiency—a lack that was not apparent when we made the original appropriation. But in these hearings we have a new phenomenon. The Secretary of the Navy admitted, in testifying before our committee, that the Navy Department would have to ask for a deficiency appropriation for the fiscal year 1941 of approximately $100,000,000. He said that he could be certain that the appropriation would not be more than that for he had the items pretty well in mind. He knew what he would have to ask for and the cost thereof. Is it that the New Deal did not want to come and ask that we appropriate more than $1,000,000,000 for the Navy the next year all in one bill? Did they think it would meet public sentiment better if they were to ask for $954,000,000 now and $100,000,000 or so a little later? At least, this is a possible conclusion from the evidence that was tendered to us.

An adequate national-defense program is a necessity. I have always advocated it and supported measures looking toward that end. I believe the Navy is our first line of defense. I intend to help in providing for its reasonable requirements. But an expansion program based on an undefined foreign policy or on an exaggerated domestic need—a program that carries with it an admitted divergence of funds—must be looked upon with some degree of apprehension and a considerable amount of suspicion.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FRIES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech delivered by our distinguished Attorney General, Mr. Robert H. Jackson, to the American Youth Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM:

On page 35, line 2, after the parenthesis, strike out the remainder of line 2, and all of lines 3, 4, 5, and all of line 6 through and including the word "Reserve."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses and minor extensions and improvements of public works at navy yards and stations, $140,000 ("A" item).

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-three Members are present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. RAYBURN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8438, the naval appropriation bill, 1941, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, when 332 Members responded to their names, a quorum, and he handed in the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee will resume its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fourteenth naval district—Guam: Improvement of harbors and channels, $3,000,000; Pearl Harbor: Mooring facilities, $200,000.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICHARDS: Page 42, lines 7 and 8, after the word "district", strike out the words and figures "Guam: Improvement of harbor and channels, $3,000,000."

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to submit a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate upon this amendment conclude in 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nevada asks unanimous consent that debate upon this paragraph be limited to 1 hour. Is there objection?

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. Is it understood that those on their feet at the present time will receive recognition under the allotted time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will undertake to recognize them as best he can.

Mr. FADDIS. Is it understood that we will get 5 minutes each in that case?

The CHAIRMAN. If the time is fixed, the Chair will undertake to apportion it equally.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to strike the Guam item because I consider it the only really useless, and I might say dangerous, provision in the naval appropriation bill for this year. A great deal of talk has been indulged in and a smoke screen has been cast around in order that it may appear to the uninformed that those opposed to this provision in the bill are more concerned with the Japanese viewpoint than anything else. It does not make any difference to me what the Japanese think about it. There is no Member of this House who is less in sympathy with the present policy of Japanese aggression than I am. No Member realizes more clearly than I that Japan must pursue a different course in the future if she is to continue as a real friend of the United States. Some people say that we who are opposed to this provision are not in favor of proper naval strength for the United States. Personally I think we should have a navy as great as any on the face of the earth. I go further and say that I think an indispensable outpost in our defense system is the Pearl Harbor naval base at Hawaii, and I will vote for any measure that will tend to make that base the greatest on the face of the earth. Hawaii is something over 2,000 miles away from the United States. It has been testified by experts time and time again that our natural western defense line extends from the Aleutian Islands to Hawaii to Samoa to the Panama Canal; but, Mr. Chairman, it is a different proposition when the Navy comes in here and says, "We want funds from Congress to begin the establishment of a great naval base over 6,000 miles away from the United States, 3,800 miles beyond our farthest defensive point up to this time, which is Hawaii"—a distance beyond the Hawaiian Islands as far as from here to Europe. That is what they are asking today, and do not let anyone tell you anything else. Proponents of this item will assert that this is innocuous and harmless, the little $3,000,000 asked for the development of normal harbor facilities at the harbor of Guam. Last year they decided to test this thing before the Congress through the Naval Affairs Committee, and Admiral Cook came before the Naval Affairs Committee, and Admiral Leahy and Admiral Moreell. The latter asserted, when asked why he did not go before the Appropriations Committee for an appropriation under existing law or why he did not go before the Rivers and Harbors Committee, that it was because the Navy wants to lay its cards on the table to Congress. The Navy laid what cards it had on the table, and Congress decided that those cards were not in the interest of the American people and were not in the interest of peace. The whole United States public, as shown by the Gallup poll, is in sympathy with China as against Japan; is not in sympathy with Japan's aggressive policy; but it has never been the concrete opinion of the American public that the Navy should go 6,000 miles away from home and build another Gibraltar or a Singapore on the little island of Guam in the midst of 1,000 Japanese mandated islands, some of them not more than 25 miles away, and some of them already fortified.

Now, that may be a very good thing for a nation that is embarking on an imperialistic policy, but it is not a good thing for a nation that has never given ear to the doctrine of imperialism. It might be a good thing for Great Britain to build naval bases all over the world, because Great Britain owns territory all over the world, but the United States does not. The United States in 1936 openly declared through Congress that we intended to get out of that Achilles' heel of the United States known as the Philippine Islands, when considered from a defensive standpoint. If you embark on a program of fortifying Guam, just as sure as you are sitting here today a movement will follow that we repeal the law passed in 1936 giving independence to the Philippine Islands. We have promised those islands their independence time and time again, and they have asserted their right to and belief in independence time and again. They seem not to be quite so anxious for independence just now on account of fear of Japan, but the Filipinos must remember that they cannot "have their cake and eat it, too."

Last year, when the admirals came before this Naval Committee, Admiral Cook said that he wanted to lay his cards on the table. He said, "We just want to improve these innocent little harbor facilities." Last year the Congress did not think that that is all they wanted to do. Now they come here, through the Appropriations Committee, after Congress had turned down an authorization, and they say, "Well, we are going to come in through the other door and get the same thing." It is another door but leading to the same old thing—the report shows that. Here is what Admiral Cook said last year. They asked $5,000,000 last year and now they are asking $3,000,000. Admiral Cook said:

> Of the $5,000,000 proposed, at least $4,000,000 will be devoted to dredging a breakwater, and the remainder will be used for a tender pier, airplane ramps, and parking area.

Every bit of it in the harbor; yet the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS], who is an authority on the subject, says that the improvements asked for here are for shore improvements. They are no more so than those asked last year through the Naval Affairs Committee, when Congress turned them down.

The American people believe in millions for defense but not one cent for tribute, and not one cent for going into territory where we do not belong, to build great naval bases or great forts, or anything else.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDS. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I notice in this bill on the same page on which the item for the improvement of Guam is included, a large number of other places to be improved. I would like to have the gentleman tell us what is the difference in the right of our country to improve its property, whether it be at Norfolk, Va., or anywhere else?

Mr. RICHARDS. Our country has a right to improve anything that belongs to us. We have a right to walk down the street if a machine gun is barking; but it is not always wise and expedient. It is not a wise thing for the American Nation to go 6,000 miles from home when we do not have one single thing to defend in that territory and in that area, in the midst of a group of mandated islands, 1,000 of them, controlled by a nation that is not generally considered to be friendly to us; a nation that has a kind of government we do not believe in. We are hunting trouble when we go out there, and if we go out there we are going to have more trouble than you ever heard of in the event of war, because it is generally known, and every expert admits, that the farther you go away from home on land or on water, the harder it is to defend yourself and the harder it is to stay out of trouble.

Now, if this item is allowed to stay in the bill the Navy people will come back here a little later on and they will say, "You have extended our defense lines 3,800 miles; defense strength on sea depreciates in ratio to the distance our defense lines are stretched. We, therefore, need many more big battleships. We need many more great guns to defend these extended lines. You started us out on this program, now back us up. We cannot back down. We have come to Guam because Congress approved and, just because the Japanese do not want us down here, is that any reason why we should run?" Then you gentleman, along with myself, will possibly have to back up the unwise action that this Congress has been a party to.

So I ask you, my friends, if this harbor at Guam needs dredging, if it needs new jetties, let them come back again like they did last year and say they want to lay their cards on the table and let Congress debate this more fully, or let them go to the Rivers and Harbors Committee where they went in the first instance. But no, they did not get in that door before, so they have chosen this door. Congress did not approve of the way they laid their cards on the table that time and they don't want to lay them there again.

You can believe it is an innocuous proposition if you want to. You can believe there is no danger in it, but I cannot believe that. You may believe that it is wise from a strategic military standpoint to inject that salient 6,000 miles away from the United States, but I cannot. I hope you will agree with me that this item will bring great danger of our involvement in trouble in the Orient. Help me strike it from the bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that before we can arrive at any correct solution, or give final consideration to what should be done with Guam, we should know what our decision will be as to the future of the Philippines. Under legislation that was enacted several years ago the Philippines are to have their independence in 1946, and the United States is to leave the islands at that time. It will become an independent country, and by the vote and at the request of the Filipinos themselves. If we carry out this policy and do not take upon ourselves the moral obligation to defend the Philippines, even though it is an independent country, then there is no occasion, it seems to me, for fortifying Guam. If we are going to concede that we have a moral obligation in the Philippines, then we should consider adequately fortifying the Philippines, and then we shall have to have a navy twice as big as we contemplate now; and if we fortify Guam and undertake to protect it against the aggression of the nearest nation to it—Japan—then again we shall have to have a navy twice as big as we now contemplate.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield.

Mr. KNUTSON. How much further would it increase our line of defense in the Pacific if Guam were fortified?

Mr. TERRY. It will increase our line of defense at least 3,800 miles, the distance Guam is from Hawaii.

Mr. KNUTSON. That would necessitate greatly increasing the Navy.

Mr. TERRY. The gentleman is correct.

It is said that for Japan to attack the United States it would have to have a navy twice as big as Japan has now. For the same reason, for us to protect Guam and the Philippines, we would have to have a navy twice as big as the one we contemplate now.

So when you come to the question of fortifying Guam—and that is the ultimate thing we have got to consider here—then we must decide that we are going to have a navy twice as big as we are appropriating for now in order to have any chance of protecting our new outpost.

If this item is in good faith a mere harbor-dredging proposition, why not let it come under the Rivers and Harbors Committee where things of this sort are taken care of? They say that Guam is under the control of the Navy and therefore the Navy should do this work, but that is not a complete answer. We are doing dredging work now, getting rid of coral reefs in order to assist commercial air lines and our naval planes, in the harbor at the Midway Islands, and we are going to dredge at Wake Island. The Army engineers, under the Rivers and Harbors Committee, are doing that work. Then, if this is merely a dredging proposition, why not let this project come to the Rivers and Harbors Committee and let them make the proper authorization and report out legislation for that purpose?

Mr. Chairman, this is that same old moth-eaten camel we have heard so much about. I do not know what we would do if we did not have this old camel. I do not know what we should do if we did not have the old "red herring" to drag across the trail. Here you have the camel sticking his nose under the proverbial tent. The admirals told us last year that it was their intention to fortify Guam. They have not given up that idea. They never give up an idea when once it enters their heads. This is merely the opening wedge. I say to you, my colleagues, that if this is merely a dredging project and if you want it done in a regular, orderly manner, and at the least expense, you will turn it over to the Army engineers under the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The Army engineers are now doing this work at Midway, and, as I said a while ago, they are going to do it at Wake. They have the personnel and they have the equipment which they will use and move from place to place in the most economical manner.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TERRY. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman understands, of course, that the Navy has jurisdiction to make these improvements.

Mr. TERRY. I said that the Navy Department has jurisdiction at Guam.

Mr. MOTT. What difference does the gentleman think it makes whether the Army engineers do it or whether the Navy Department does it?

Mr. TERRY. The Army engineers would do it with the same equipment and personnel they are using to do this work at Midway and at Wake. It will be done properly and economically by them, and we will not have all this camouflage about fortifications in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, last year I voted against the authorization for the $5,000,000 item then in the bill for Guam. As I said the other day in general debate, I voted that way because of misinformation. This year I have read the hearings very carefully, and I cannot see any connection between the expenditure of this $3,000,000 in the improvement of this harbor and fortifying Guam. Not only do we have Navy planes landing there, but it is used as a stopping place for the clipper ships flying the Pacific, and I am one Member of Congress who would not want to take the responsibility of refusing to make this improvement and perhaps reading in the press some months from now that a clipper ship loaded with passengers had turned over in the harbor of Apra.

The only objection I can see to this item in this bill is the question of whether it should be done by the Navy Department or by civilian contractors.

I am unalterably opposed to any department of the Government doing work that can be done as well or better by civilians.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. CALDWELL. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact there is nothing in this appropriation which prescribes the method to be followed in the development work on this harbor. It can be done and will be done by private contractors.

Mr. MILLER. I thank the gentleman. I raise that point because the testimony before the committee was to the effect there was no civilian company equipped to do this work in Guam. I questioned that statement at the time, and I sent a wire to one of the largest marine contractors in the country. I have their answer in my possession that they are equipped to do the work in Guam. I express this thought in the hope the Navy Department will give civilian contractors who are equipped to do this type of work the opportunity to bid on it. I hope that the work will be done and water provided for the island of Guam. If we are going to keep Navy personnel there, they are entitled to adequate drinking water. Naval and civilian pilots are entitled to a place for safe landing, and they cannot get that until this breakwater is built and the coral reefs removed.

Mr. CALDWELL. In reference to the statement the gentleman made that there was no civilian organization capable of doing this work, may I say that there was no organization over there large enough to accomplish the objective; however, the civilian organizations of this country could afford to go there at some fair degree of economy and do the work.

Mr. MILLER. I thank the gentleman. That is one thing I questioned in the report.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. When we consider the fact that this island is 3,850 miles beyond Hawaii, why should the American Government own an island that far away from its own shores? What is the object? Why should not that island be given to some other country so that we will not eventually have to fortify it, then wave a red flag in front of some of these Asiatic countries which might think we are eventually going to war with them.

Mr. MILLER. I am opposed to fortifying the island of Guam, but I do not think we should be led to believe that this is the first step toward fortification. This is a safety measure only and it is not exorbitant in comparison with the sum of money we are spending for the improvement of our civilian aviation.

In the remaining minute may I call the attention of members of the committee to the appropriation for the construction of two 45,000-ton battleships? One of these battleships was authorized in 1934 and the other in 1938.

I believe that this Government should go very slowly in voting appropriations for huge battleships. The development of bombing technique has been very rapid. While it is true at the present time that there is no other country with as efficient a bombing site as the bombing site used by our Army and Navy, we know it is only a question of time until some European power will be able to copy it. When we see bombs released on a 12-foot target from an altitude of 14,000 feet and make 8 out of 10 hits, we cannot help but wonder what value a battleship would be in modern warfare.

If we are in danger of attack, and the proponents of this naval expansion program maintain we are only providing for defense, it seems to me that the millions this bill provides to build these two huge battleships could much better be spent in increasing our fleet of submarines and aircraft, with possibly some addition to the cruiser and destroyer group. I am convinced that before the present World War comes to an end, battleships will be a thing of the past.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, in consideration of the pending amendment to strike out the appropriation for this harbor in Guam I hope the members of the committee will cast aside any sectional viewpoint. This is not a question of either surrendering or retaining any territory over which we may have control which furnishes competition to cottonseed oil. It is a question of the preservation of our commercial life.

One of our most important commercial life lines is to the east. It reaches to the Dutch East Indies. From here comes our supply of rubber and tin—the two most important of our industrial commodities for which we are dependent upon importation. Upon these two essential commodities is builded our automobile and tin-plate industries, with their various subsidiary industries.

The Navy of the United States is for the purpose of protecting our national interests abroad as the need may arise. If it is to protect our interests in the east, it must have bases from which to operate. If this territory should fall under the control of an unfriendly power which would undertake to deny our commerce access to these markets, we must be able to protect our commerce. If we do not do so, then we will deteriorate into a second-class nation. Our trade is valuable and must be protected. Oh, I know an idea to the contrary exists today, but that idea will pass as other foolish fancies have passed. Trade is necessary to civilization and democracy.

What would an interruption of our trade to the east mean to the cotton-producing sections of this Nation? It would mean the destruction of our automobile industry. The surplus of cotton which would result would be a far greater calamity than the competing coconut oil from the Philippine Islands ten times over. What would the shut-down of our tin-plate industry mean to this Nation? It would affect not only those centers where the tin plate is made, but every agricultural section where produce is raised for canning.

If our supply of tin and rubber should be interrupted, then we would indeed have an employment problem of gigantic proportions on our hands. I believe it would at least triple our unemployment. We must not take any chance, in the face of world development, of leaving our commerce in the east unguarded.

I resent the implications that the American Navy is desirous of engaging in missions which may lead us into war. It never has and I hope it never will engage in such missions. It must, however, be in position to protect our legitimate trade in any quarter of the globe when and if the necessity for protection may appear. Let us assist it in this mission by voting down this amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I have never seen this House do anything unless it was the opinion of the majority of the House that the thing it was trying to do had some reason for having it done. What is the purpose, after all, of this Guam appropriation? Not even the friends of the proposed appropriation will contend that it is for the purpose of fortifying Guam, because every naval authority, and I think every man in this House, will admit that we could never keep men enough on Guam and hold it. So it can only be for the purpose of dredging a harbor, so to speak.

There is no one in this House more friendly to aviation than I. I believe Pan American is doing a grand job in flying the Pacific. I also believe they are doing a grand job of landing at Guam right now. I did not know until just a few minutes ago that this was a regularly scheduled stop. If it is, the Pan American clippers are every trip stopping at Guam and making landings and take-offs. So what is the matter? They have been getting in there for the entire length of the operation of the Pan American system across the Pacific Ocean, and if they have been doing it for a year or more, why is it, then, that they cannot continue to do so?

Do we need Guam for a landing for Navy planes? I do not think so. The Navy has no scheduled flights across the Pacific; only Pan American has them. If the facilities at Guam are now such that Pan American makes scheduled stops there every trip, then what is the Navy complaining about if they do not want to fortify Guam?

For us to set some men on the island of Guam is to set a decoy out there that no one will say we can defend. No one can give a good reason why we need the island even if we could defend it. It is only the size of your hand. We would be sitting out there, a target for Japan.

Whenever Japan is ready, without the formality of a declaration of war, it could go out there and jump on Guam and kill some American sailors or soldiers or marines, and then we would be insulted. Then Japan could go back into her shell and, in order to protect the dignity of this Nation, we would have to send the Navy and the Army of the United States to Japan and declare war on her; and this when there was never any sense in putting our men out there in the first place, like a sore thumb, to be jumped on by Japan.

Mr. Chairman, I am certainly going to support this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLMER].

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I can add anything to the argument that has been made here against this appropriation, but I do feel keenly the duty and the responsibility to raise my voice in protest again this year, as I did last year, against this beginning of the fortification of an island approximately 6,000 miles from the American shores.

Let me read briefly from a statement of General Schley, Chief of the Army Engineers. I believe most of you will be interested in getting these figures about the location of this island:

> By trade routes the island is 1,820 miles southeast of Hong Kong, China; 1,350 miles almost due south of Yokohama, Japan; 1,740 miles east of Manila, P. I.; 3,070 miles north of Sydney, Australia; 3,320 miles west of Honolulu, T. H.; 7,990 miles west of the Panama Canal Zone; and 5,050 miles southwest of San Francisco, Calif.

In other words, we are embarking upon a new foreign policy of fortifying—and that is all this is, the beginning of the fortification—an island that far away from the American shore.

This House is a wonderful body. It is composed of what I believe are the best minds in this country, but it can do some very peculiar things sometimes. Last year when this matter was under consideration, not in connection with an appropriation and not in an era of economy, this House turned down the authorization for the appropriation. This year, when we are in the midst of a drive for economy, when the farmers want money and have been turned down by the House, we apparently now are on the verge of appropriating money for an island way out there bordering upon Japan. [Applause.]

I cannot believe that this House is so soon going to reverse its position. What is there that has happened that would so change the situation as to justify the House in reversing its position so quickly? On the contrary, is there not every reason that the House should be consistent and again refuse the funds to begin what eventually will be a fortification of an island just off the shores of Japan with the resultant and inevitable international complications that would arise? But in this connection permit me to say that I am in nowise motivated by what Japan might think of this, or any other foreign nation for that matter. My opposition to the improving or fortifying of this island is not, as some have suggested, due to Japan's opposition. I do not give a tinker's damn about what Japan might think of it. But I am concerned with the trouble that it might lead to so far as this country is concerned. This country is not now, nor has it ever been, a country with imperialistic tendencies. If we want to embark upon the troubled seas of imperialism, then this is a good way to begin. It does not require a vivid imagination to foresee that this is but the entering wedge to the eventual fortification of this island. It was recommended in the Hepburn report, and its most ardent advocates of this improvement here today believe in the fortification of the island.

Moreover, it does not require a seer to see that the island having been fortified at an enormous expense to an already overburdened Government will require the call of American youth eventually to defend such fortifications off the shores of Japan. Do you not realize that when we begin to fortify islands off the coasts of other countries that this is another demand for an ever larger and larger Navy and armed force?

But, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed not only to the fortification of this island with its resultant evils but I am opposed to the expenditure of even $3,000,000 of the taxpayers' money at a time when we are trying to do everything within our power to prevent additional taxation and to prevent going further and further into the red each year. This House refused to make the appropriation this year for parity prices for the farmers of the country. And let me digress here to say that so far as I have been able to learn the farmers of the country have been the only ones who have been cut in this economy drive.

It is argued here that this will afford better facilities for the commercial air lines which navigate this course to the Orient. Is it not true that we are now subsidizing these air lines at the expense of the taxpayers? Here is an opportunity to cut the appropriation of somebody other than the farmers who so far have been made the goat in this drive for economy. I hope that the amendment may be adopted. Having led off in the fight last year against this item, it was my purpose to offer this amendment on this occasion. But I was glad to yield to my distinguished friend, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS], who did offer this amendment. The gentleman from South Carolina is a ranking member of the Foreign Affairs Committee. He is a patriot of the first order; an American who offered his all upon the altar of his country in the late World War, and who was a hero of that conflict. As a power on the Foreign Affairs Committee I hope that you will believe me when I say that he is a man of sound discretion and whose judgment can be followed with safety on this amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE].

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, as has been stated, this same matter has been disposed of one other time since I have been a Member of this Congress, and I hope it will be summarily disposed of today and probably finally disposed of.

I have listened to the discussion of the necessity or supposed necessity for fortifying the island of Guam, and it is just a reiteration of what took place here 2 years ago. There is no necessity for it. Of course, if you go to the island of Guam and make a radius from that point you will find you are closer to Japan than you are to Honolulu; but that is no reason for fortifying Guam.

There is just one reason for this action, and that is to extend the boundary line of activities for the Navy of the United States. If we want to do anything to keep this country out of war, right here is a pretty good place to start.

Like the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS], the author of this amendment, I have nothing in common with Japan; if I do, I do not know anything about it. There is an appropriation item in the bill of $325,000 to buy drinking water for the island of Guam. I believe the gentleman from South Carolina had this idea in mind when he offered his amendment. If we want to buy drinking water, that is all right with me; put $325,000 worth of drinking water on the island. That is what the bill provides for. Then we are not likely to get into any war. If we do, all we have to do to separate the Government of the United States from Guam is just to knock the bungs out of the barrels and let the thing go.

Now, this is an item of $3,000,000, and they ought to keep this $3,000,000 for other purposes. We want to use it for something sensible and something that will be worth while to some of the people of the United States. We need this $3,000,000 to further the soil-conservation program that was knocked out by the committee that was handling the agricultural appropriation bill. You should give us this $3,000,000 to give to the farmers of the United States to foster and carry on the work of the soil-conservation districts in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday when I spoke with respect to this bill, I praised the work of the members of the subcommittee and neglected, unintentionally, to pay due respect and credit to the clerk of the committee, Mr. George Harvey, who jumped into the breech, due to the illness of our beloved friend, John Pugh, and in jumping into the breech without any warning or preparation, Mr. Harvey has filled a big gap and has helped the committee immeasurably. I want these words to appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, giving due credit where credit is due.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TERRY. A few minutes ago one of the speakers said that unless we provided this line of trade to the east, we would not have a place to get rubber. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that they have rubber in South America and if we would get our rubber there we would be in a better position to protect the line of trade to South America and we would be helping a country that we should help.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. That is going a little far afield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Will the gentleman permit the minority to endorse everything that he has said with respect to the services of Mr. George Harvey.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I know that the minority feels that way about it.

Now, what are we confronted with in this proposition with respect to the spending of this money on the improvement of Guam Harbor? In the first place, Guam belongs to the United States. We took it over after the War with Spain. On December 23, 1898, President McKinley made it a naval station. There is no question about our right to possess and there is no question about our ownership. Now, we come here as the Naval Appropriations Committee and ask you to vote for what? For $3,000,000 to improve that harbor. The argument that has been going on here today is an argument against fortifications. As far as the right of the Navy to do this is concerned, let me state quite simply that the Navy needs no authorization to do this. It already has the authorization. This is merely a simple appropriation item.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RICHARDS. If the Navy needs no authorization to do this and did not feel obligated to ask Congress for an authorization, why did they come here last year and ask for it?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. That is water under the bridge, but they need no authorization at the present time. This is simply an appropriation bill.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I will be pleased to yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL. May I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the authorization before the House last year did not go specifically to the improvement of the harbor, but went further than that and included authority to purchase or acquire by gift or otherwise certain land and to construct buildings and certain accessories. It was not specifically for the improvement of the harbor but for the construction of buildings and the completion of certain developments on that island.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I say this is simply an appropriation to improve harbor facilities at Guam. At the present time, due to the rough water in that harbor, where the sea rushes in unobstructed, ships have difficulty in entering the harbor. Planes find it almost impossible to land except under unusually calm conditions. This money will be spent to build a breakwater to reduce the swell, to make the water in the harbor calm, and thus insure safe landing. The appropriation will further provide for the removal of dangerous coral reefs.

This harbor is being used today and will be continued in use whether we make this appropriation or not; but if we do not make this appropriation, planes and ships will be in constant danger, and many lives may be lost. These planes are commercial planes and naval planes. A safe harbor is necessary, because this is a regular stop between Midway and Wake Island and the Philippines. It is the only stop a plane can make in flying a distance of 3,000 miles over the ocean. It is therefore essential to improve this harbor to insure safe shipping and safe flying.

Some of my friends have raised the cry that this is a preliminary step to the fortification of the island. Gentlemen, we can cross that bridge when we come to it. There is nothing about this appropriation that contemplates fortification. The only way the island can be fortified is by the Appropriations Committee coming in here at a future date and asking the Congress for an appropriation to fortify Guam. If you feel that Guam should not be fortified, you can vote against the appropriation at that time. But right here and now it is our plain, unbounded duty, in the interest of safe flying and safe shipping, to vote for this appropriation. [Applause.]

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I brought some charts here today so that we could see just what we are talking about, and I shall try to explain what this item in the naval appropriation bill proposes to do.

You will see on this chart of the island of Guam, on the northwest corner is the harbor of Apra. That is the harbor that we intend to dredge and where we should erect a sea wall in order that it may be a protected harbor, which it is not today. Realize that you are in the typhoon district out there. The sea rolls in unobstructed, so it is proposed to spend $2,200,000 of this $4,000,000 to erect a sea wall from the Spanish islands over here to the reef. One million eight hundred thousand dollars is to take these coral bumps out of the harbor. Why? So our ships, our planes, or anybody else's ships or planes, might use that harbor as we have to do in commerce, as we do all the time in every harbor that we have used in the past, whether it is in the continental limits of the United States or in the outlying possessions. We had to do the same thing to Samoa; today we are doing the same thing to Wake and to Midway. We are constantly doing it in the Hawaiian Islands in the development of Pearl Harbor.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IZAC. Yes.

Mr. TERRY. At Wake you are doing it under Rivers and Harbors, are you not?

Mr. IZAC. Of course.

Mr. TERRY. And at Midway?

Mr. IZAC. At Midway and Wake the Army engineers are doing it; but as the gentleman knows—and I do not have to go any further than my own harbor of San Diego—that there we have to do some of the dredging ourselves and the Navy has to do some for itself. We do not go out and ask the Army engineers to do all of this work, because you would have to give them a whole lot more than $30,000,000 or $75,000,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Is it not a fact that this island is a naval base and is governed by the Navy and no one else in command?

Mr. IZAC. It is under an officer of the Navy, and, of course, he is there for the express purpose of doing everything in times of stress or in times of peace or in war to take care of the needs of our commerce, which is exemplified today by the Pan American route to the Orient. Let me direct your attention to this fact: This island is the focal point for the whole Orient. Do not forget that this is the crossroads of the east. If you were sending out a clipper to the west, to the south, to the north, you would have to go through the island of Guam. To the south is Australia, to the west is China and the mainland of Asia. To the north is Japan. All our hopes for the trade of the future rest in the Pacific. You cannot get it in the Atlantic. We have almost exhausted the possibilities there. Our whole future is right here in the development of the traffic on the high seas to the Orient, and Guam is the focal point through which our aviation routes must go. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a year ago this same matter of the question of Guam came before the House for consideration under a favorable report from the Committee on Naval Affairs. There was quite a good deal of opposition in the committee at the time, but a majority of the members voted out the bill. When the measure came on the floor of the House it was fully discussed, and after the debate the Guam provision in the naval authorization bill was stricken out; and here we have it again, not from the Committee on Naval Affairs but from the Committee on Appropriations. Why this circumvention of the ordinary procedure of the House? Those of us who are on the Committee on Naval Affairs have some idea as to procedure in this respect, and we know that in the cases of Wake Island and Midway Island, where harbor developments have been authorized, the procedure was somewhat different from that pertaining to the present bill. The regular procedure was followed. I wish you gentlemen would look at this map. Here is continental United States. There is Honolulu, and there is Wake Island, 4,100 miles from the mainland, and there is Midway Island, over 3,000 miles into the mid-Pacific. Wake and Midway Islands were authorized under resolution of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and of which our good friend from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] is the chairman. A complete study was made under that authorization by the War Department and a favorable report recorded and money appropriated. The work is now going on in Midway Island and will presently start in Wake Island. Back in 1900 the Committee on Rivers and Harbors presented a resolution to the House authorizing a study of Guam Harbor. That study was carried out by the Navy Department, but the report up to this time has never been presented. Obviously there is some reason for contravening this procedure. First, we have the Committee on Rivers and Harbors authorizing a study of Guam by the Navy Department in 1901. No report was ever made by the Navy Department to the Congress. Second, consideration by the Committee on Naval Affairs and a report brought in here defeated by the House a year ago, and now, by circumventing that former procedure, the Committee on Appropriations bring it in.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. I have only a few moments. It will be noted that Honolulu is 2,100 miles away from the mainland, and that the island of Guam is 3,300 miles away from Honolulu, and 5,600 miles from continental United States, but only 1,400 miles from the island of Japan. If we want to create a provocative situation, this Guam provision in the bill will do it. If we are interested in maintaining peace in this country, then the thing for us to do is to go slow in matters of this kind. If there is economic justification for this development, it ought to go through the same procedure that it went through in 1900, through a Committee on Rivers and Harbors' study, and we will be able to consider it then on an entirely commercial basis and not otherwise. [Applause.]

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, a strange sentiment is being expressed in the House this afternoon. I do not believe the American public will ever understand how the Congress of the United States can say that although we own an island and want to use it, although we want to make a harbor safe for aviation and make the island safe for the people who live on it, we dare not do it because some other nation for some nebulous and hazy reason may be offended. That attitude is incomprehensible to the average American. He cannot believe that the future of America is dependent upon the adoption of a course of arrant cowardice. The first step toward peace, insofar as America is concerned, is the assertion of thoughtful and considerate independence or, to put it another way, the preservation of our national integrity. In no other way can America hold up its head in the company of nations. Any other course is an admission that we are afraid to use that which is ours. The adoption of the course proposed in the pending amendment is, in the eyes of the Orient, a complete loss of face and a surrender of national pride.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. In reply to the argument advanced by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. NICHOLS] could the gentleman tell the committee how many serious delays the Pan-American ships have had there and how many minor accidents there were which might have well been serious accidents?

Mr. CALDWELL. I do not have those figures before me, but we want to put a breakwater across the entrance of the harbor to break the swells that come there periodically. Under certain conditions in that harbor it is not safe to land airplanes. Further, under certain conditions in the harbor the coral heads create a very definite menace. What is sought to be done with this appropriation is to make the harbor safe for aviation—American aviation and the aviation of the world, civilian and naval aviation. I can see nothing inconsistent with that.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. Do I understand from what he has just said that this is only a good-faith effort on the part of the committee to do this dredging and make this a safe place for airplanes, and is not a step toward military or naval fortification of the island?

Mr. CALDWELL. Speaking for myself, I will say I am convinced that it is purely a good-faith effort to make this harbor usable. My committee—personally I am willing to do anything that ought to be done—but my committee is not in favor of the fortification of Guam.

Mr. THOMASON. There are some of us, and I am one of them, who are quite willing to do the necessary dredging there and make the place safe for aviation; but I am unalterably opposed to any step that might be taken toward the fortification of that island at this time. I am happy to have the assurance of the gentleman from Florida, a member of the Appropriations Committee, to that effect. I want the United States to lead the world in aviation. I am willing to vote for anything in reason short of military or naval activities in Guam that will improve the harbor facilities or airfield on that island. But, in view of present world conditions and the uncertainty of what will happen regarding the Philippine Islands, we should not go farther in the Pacific at this time than Hawaii.

Mr. CALDWELL. I will say that it was no part of this committee's intention to let this be the first, second, or third step toward the fortification of the harbor.

Mr. THOMASON. And, of course, there is no such intention now on the part of the Appropriations Committee to later on, or perhaps quite soon, ask for an appropriation for fortification?

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman is entirely correct so far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] is recognized.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me we are going far afield for arguments that ought to be perfectly plain to us. A study of the map will show that Guam is certainly on the line of commerce from the United States to all parts of the Orient. That it is, therefore, one of the American possessions that ought to be improved, I cannot doubt. There seems to be a feeling here that if the Committee on Rivers and Harbors had brought in this bill it would be all right. I do not believe there ought to be any such nonsensical jealousy as that between committees. I do not believe the Committee on Rivers and Harbors could feel that way about it.

We have been in the Philippines for many years. We are going to walk out of there in 6 years from now. But do you think for a moment that where we have built up a great people and have voluntarily given them their liberty, that our commercial association is going to cease, because of that? That would be the height of nonsense. What we ought to do is to follow the custom America has always followed; that is, follow our shipping wherever we find profit in it. That is what all other nations have commerce for, and that is what we have commerce for. That is what we are going to go on doing. We are going to go on carrying on more and more business with the Philippines as those islands and the people who inhabit them develop along commercial lines. This same thing will be true of Asia as Asiatic peoples develop.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. I yield.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that Guam is also the only stop between Midway and Wake Islands and the Philippines, a distance of 3,000 miles, so it is absolutely essential to make this a safe landing place.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is entirely correct, and I thank him for his contribution. The map shows all that very clearly.

The map shows that this is one of the necessary harbors on the route—the American commercial routes to all the Orient. We must have a place of safety for our ships and for our airships. We will need them more and more. This country is not going to remain an agricultural country as it was 75 years ago. It is developing constantly along industrial lines. We must understand that much of our raw material comes from that section of the world. I do not care anything about whether we are going to fortify Guam or not.

That will come up, if we want to do it, at another time. We are not doing it now. This is voting for commercial convenience and usefulness for the people of the United States in carrying on the business of the United States. If anybody is against fortification, when the time arrives then is the time to vote against fortification. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] is recognized.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Chairman, this is not the same bill that was before Congress last year which the Congress rejected, nor is it a subterfuge. It is not an attempt to do this year by indirection that which we prohibited to be done last year. The two are entirely separate propositions.

No question of fortification is involved in what is asked for in this item, nor can it possibly be interpreted that this is a step toward fortification. You could not possibly use it for that purpose because this dredging will not permit warships of any nature to use this harbor. The proposal last year was to dredge the harbor in such way that we could use seaplane tenders and bring in destroyers, but that is not involved in this item. This has to do solely with the removal of coral heads and making the harbor of Apra at Guam suitable for the use of airplanes. It is being used every day now more or less. Pan American Airways use it. When we sent our patrol squadron over to the Philippines last fall they had to mill around in the air for hours over the island of Guam because of the swells, and they were unable to land when they arrived. Frequently the Pan American clippers are delayed a day or two, sometimes even 3 days, in their take-offs because the coral heads made it impossible to take off into the wind.

What is going to be done is to remove the coral heads in the prevailing-wind runways so that these planes can take off and land under all conditions. The breakwater proposed will prevent the swells. There is nothing more to it than that. It is a plain, simple harbor development necessary for both commercial planes and such naval planes as may be going back and forth to the Philippines.

If we lose a few of our big patrol planes which have to use the harbor at Guam in going back and forth from the Philippines, it will cost as much as, if not more than, to do the dredging proposed in this appropriation. These big planes cost us up to $250,000 apiece, and there is Government insurance of $10,000 for each member of the crew; so that the cost of cracking up a few planes, with injuries or death to personnel, would very soon absorb the cost of this dredging. It is perfectly conceivable that a complete squadron might get into serious difficulties there, and the resulting cost might very easily exceed the figure of this appropriation for making the harbor safe for plane operation.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield.

Mr. KITCHENS. It is said that Japan has a thousand islands there, fortified. I am just wondering if Japan has opened up any port in those islands so our ships could have a protected harbor.

Mr. MAAS. No; they have not. They absolutely prohibit us from even visiting those ports although treaties with them provide that we have that right.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAAS. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. COLMER. The gentleman speaks of commercial aviation and the objectives sought here. We all know how the gentleman feels. Will not the gentleman tell us that he is in favor of fortifying Guam?

Mr. MAAS. Oh, personally, I will say frankly that I am in favor of making a Gibraltar of it. I believe if we did this we would be absolutely immune from attack by anybody in the Far East; but that is not a question involved at the present time.

Mr. COLMER. Quite so; but is it not a forerunner, and that the gentleman and those who belong to his school of thought will come back here in the near future advocating their plan?

Mr. MAAS. Not at all. If they do come back for that, it will be through the Committee on Naval Affairs, the legislative committee, not the Committee on Appropriations. The Committee on Appropriations can go no further than this harbor development, so there is not involved any question of fortifying the island. This would have to be decided by the Congress before any appropriation could be made available for such a purpose.

I want to point out that while the proposal in this bill is limited to improving the harbor for planes, such improvement would have tremendous national-defense value without any fortification whatever. There is not the slightest intention of extending our defense line—which is roughly drawn from the Aleutian Islands to Hawaii and through Samoa to the Panama Canal. It is important, however, in order to maintain that defense line to have observation posts well in advance of that line. Our defense line covers thousands of miles, and the fleet has to be in a position to meet an enemy threat anywhere on that line. In order to be able to meet a possible thrust anywhere along this line, it is necessary to know well in advance of such an attack where the enemy is likely to strike, so that our Navy will be able to proceed to that point. There seems to be an impression that we can string our Navy out like a fence from the Aleutian Islands to the Panama Canal. This, of course, is utter nonsense. No navy in the world could be big enough to maintain a standing guard along the whole route of our defense line in the Pacific. Many of you served in the World War. You know that while the defense line was the front-line trenches, it was necessary to have observation posts well out into no-man's land to give a warning when an attack was about to be made, so that the defense line itself would not be taken by surprise. It is even more impossible to defend a long line at sea, such as our Pacific defense line, without adequate warnings from observation posts well out in front of that line. Not to have this information might very well lead to a tragic destruction of the Canal or a surprise raid on Hawaii, or even the continental coast cities themselves. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SUTPHIN] is recognized.

Mr. SUTPHIN. Mr. Chairman, it seems rather strange to me that, having owned this island for 40 years, no effort was made prior to last year to develop its wonderful commercial facilities. I am told that last year the exports from Guam to this country amounted to $73,000.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTPHIN. I yield.

Mr. CALDWELL. Answering the gentleman's question, the gentleman knows that the reason is the development of aviation facilities. Forty years ago we did not have aviation. Trans-Pacific flights started only about a year or two ago.

Mr. SUTPHIN. I thank the gentleman for his kind observation, but am I to believe from the gentleman's statement that there were no commercial relations with this country during these 40 years?

Mr. CALDWELL. No one, of course, contends that the commerce of Guam amounts to anything, no one has suggested that.

Mr. SUTPHIN. But still the committee is justifying the spending of $3,000,000 in that out-of-the-way spot on the ground of its benefit to commerce, when practically every section of continental United States is clamoring for Federal funds at the present time. It seems to me we could much more advantageously spend this amount of money in some section of continental United States.

Mr. RICHARDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTPHIN. I yield.

Mr. RICHARDS. The gentleman is a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and, as I recall, he made a very strenuous fight on this proposition last year. It has been suggested that there is a big difference between what is sought to be done this year and what was sought to be done last year in the authorization bill which was turned down by Congress. Is there any actual difference?

Mr. SUTPHIN. If my memory serves me accurately I think one of our colleagues said that the activity there was largely if not entirely commercial aviation. This might lead us to believe that this appropriation is largely for the benefit of one commercial concern.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTPHIN. I yield.

Mr. NICHOLS. That commercial interest can, of course, be only Pan American Airways which the Government is rather liberally subsidizing in mail contracts in its foreign operations. If this harbor is so necessary to the continuance of Pan American's trans-Pacific operations, does it not occur to the gentleman that this company is strong enough to improve this harbor itself?

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTPHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think this should be called a bill for the relief of the Pan American Airways?

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTPHIN. I yield to the gentleman from Oregon.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman, who is a member of the Naval Affairs Committee, will recall that last year's authorization provided not only for the dredging of the harbor but for the erection of certain buildings and other facilities to be used by the Navy?

Mr. SUTPHIN. That is correct.

Mr. MOTT. That required an authorization. Now, the gentleman does not say that this item in the appropriation bill is the same as the authorization for Guam last year; does he?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the $3,000,000 provided in this bill for what is designated as improvement of harbors and channels of the island of Guam, first, because we have not the money; second, because regardless of how we may look upon such an expenditure, Japan will take the view that it has for its purpose the ultimate building up of a huge fortification and naval base on this island. This would not ameliorate the already too strained relations between us. I am of the opinion there can be no gain to the United States in doing anything which has even the possibility of further straining these relations.

Granting the harbor and channel improvements proposed in this measure may be desirable, the amount of good that would be accomplished is entirely too insignificant to be compared with the damage which might result to us from such a move.

I do not claim to be a student of maritime or any other kind of warfare. What I do know, however, about the far-eastern situation and ours in relation to it convinces me that the United States should be exceedingly careful in any move we might make in the far Pacific which might in any way involve our future relations with Japan. There is not, in my opinion, a single naval student in the world who will not readily acknowledge that Japan is in a position to take the Philippines, as well as Guam Island, should she be of a mind to do so. Naval strategists have not hesitated to stress the supreme task it would be for the United States to recover those possessions from Japan should she take them away from us. Major Eliot in the Ramparts We Watch is far from convincing that they could be recovered, and certainly leaves the impression that the cost, in any event, would be colossal if not entirely prohibitive.

The United States would do well to recognize these fundamental facts and base its far-eastern policy squarely upon them. We do not want anyone to take the Philippines away from us, but we should get rid of them at the earliest moment in the best saving manner possible.

The question of Guam as it affects our future position in the far Pacific should at this moment remind us of an exceedingly important event that took place at the World War Peace Conference in Paris. That event is little known to the American people but may be of the greatest importance to us. Certainly it has a most profound bearing upon the outcome of any possible conflict between our Nation and Japan.

Do you remember how the Japanese delegates at the peace conference claimed the former German islands north of the equator, the Marianas, excepting Guam, Marshall, Caroline, and Pellew, excepting full control of Yap, as a part of their spoils of war? Do you remember how President Wilson asked the Japanese delegates upon what ground they based their claim—it is supposed he knew nothing of this arrangement up to that time—to possession of these islands? And do you remember how Wilson was frankly told that they claimed them because they had a treaty with England, France, Russia, and Italy that upon the conclusion of peace they were to receive the former German-owned islands in the Pacific north of the Equator and Great Britain those south of it? It is difficult to believe that President Wilson did not know of that treaty until the question came up formally at the peace conference. It had been revealed long before that in this country. However that may be, the facts are it was a secret treaty, first concluded between herself and England February 16, 1917; France, March 1, 1917; Russia, March 5, 1917; and Italy sometime later. Certain it is the United States did not know of this secret agreement when we entered the war on April 6, 1917. The powers with whom we were associated in the war were fully aware that we intended to enter the conflict at the time those secret treaties were written. Assuredly it was the duty of our then Allies to apprise us of those understandings when we joined the conflict. They knew the great importance to the United States of those secret arrangements. They knew that to hand those islands over to Japan might mean some day that America would be at a great disadvantage in preserving her interests and rights in the Far East. Strange gratitude toward our Nation, which had risked its all for what we were led to believe was a common cause. On our part it was a most shameful surrender.

The American people should now do some serious thinking about this. Another conflict very much like the one in 1914–18 is again in progress in Europe. We should recall that Wilson somehow got the idea, long before we entered the war, that he should play a prominent part at the peace conference when the time came for it. The thought became almost an obsession with him and no doubt influenced him greatly in his decision to have our country enter the war. Our present Executive is now following Wilson's pattern. His expressions of our interest in the peace settlement to be made after the war are identical with those of Wilson. Surely it cannot be that we are to see the sorry failure and humiliation of 1917–18 repeated. However well meaning Wilson may have been, he found himself, when finally confronted with the facts in Paris, in an ocean of secret commitments and intrigue by the Old World powers, so completely foreign to his own understanding that his influence was wholly nil. Exactly the same thing would happen to us were our Nation to repeat that terrible folly, which, God forbid.

Just a few words respecting the sum we are appropriating for the Navy Department, $966,772,878. The following shows how the annual expenditures for the Navy have climbed:

1933	$349,561,925
1934	297,029,291
1935	436,447,860
1936	529,031,666
1937	556,884,449
1938	596,278,301
1939	672,968,993

Although only $778,188,011 was appropriated for the fiscal year 1940, a deficiency appropriation made this year brought the total up to $915,360,249. For 1941 this bill provides $966,772,878.

It is needless to say that we all want adequate defense. This should not blind us to the state of our national finances. We are, as all thoughtful people recognize, a very sick nation internally, being made worse each day by the increasing Federal deficit. Hence we are in a very peculiar position, a very unpleasant one. Whatever may be our needs for additional expenditures for defense, every dollar we increase previous costs burdens our sick economy that much more. After all, it is hardly a good thing to do to give a sick man a gun too heavy for him to carry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the committee in charge of this bill the following question: Is the expenditure that we are debating here today to be made in the name of, or as a program for, peace, or what?

Mr. SCRUGHAM. The issue involved is whether the Congress of the United States wishes to take the responsibility for protecting the lives of American aviators.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I am referring to the whole program. I am interested in the $966,000,000, of which this $3,000,000 for Guam is only a small part.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. It is a program of peace. If the gentleman will read the report and if he will read my speech explaining this bill, I stated to the effect: Who are we going to fight? We are not going to fight anybody if this program is carried through as outlined.

Mr. ALEXANDER. All right. I am glad to get the gentleman's viewpoint on this matter. If it is a program for peace, then it seems to me we are not going far enough. We should go a whole lot farther.

How much money does it take to protect a nation from war? If this is a peace program, it means, I assume, that we are going to be protected from war. How much money have the nations of Europe spent for national defense so as to be protected from war and how much good has it done? Where are we going to begin and where are we going to stop with this program if we decide to follow this sort of program for peace? That is the point I want to make.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that what we as Members of Congress should do is call a spade a spade and face the facts, the realities in this great problem now confronting the war-inflamed world, this world which is upset on every hand and in all corners of the globe by military dictatorships, so that now of all the leading nations we alone are not at war, excepting, perhaps, Italy. What good is it going to do us to spend $3,000,000 to improve the harbor at Guam if this is a program for peace? We want to spend enough money there to protect ourselves from attack in case of war, do we not? And according to the statements made in the debate here this money is only to dredge the harbor and make a better landing place for planes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Does the gentleman contend that the British made a mistake in fortifying the Falkland Islands down in this hemisphere, right off the coast of South America? Has he any objection to that? It is the same situation. The British come over here on our side and fortify islands. Why should we not fortify Guam?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, that is true. We have fortified the Philippines right under the nose of the Japanese, and the British fortified Hong Kong, and that did not result in war. The point I make is we cannot head off war either by these preparedness expenditures or by pacifism; that is, by not spending money for preparedness.

TWO BILLIONS FOR DEFENSE

In this bill and in others to come we will be asked to appropriate upward of $2,000,000,000 for national defense—a so-called program for peace. But it is a misnomer if we call it that.

This is some sum of money, and we should try to get something out of it. Do you realize that it is $500,000,000 more than we spent for all purposes in this Government in the war Budget fiscal year of 1916–17? Do you realize that it is more than we are now asked to appropriate this year for such urgent domestic needs as relief of the unemployed, pensions, aids to agriculture, for public works, or even for interest on our unholy and uncalled-for public debt, and also more than our regular operating expenses of the Government departments?

What a problem it is becoming we can fully realize when such comparisons are made, but when we consider the fact that to support this god of Mars we are cutting out or down on needful programs, it gives us reason to pause and ponder whence this is all leading us. When we consider that we are asked to forego wise and helpful expenditures for civil functions of the War Department so we can build for war, we wonder.

Here is an example of what we are doing. Hear this clipping taken from the Minneapolis Tribune of February 7, quoting General Schley, of the United States Army Engineers:

ST. ANTHONY LOCKS PLANS COMPLETED

MEMPHIS, TENN., February 6.—Maj. Gen. Julian L. Schley, Chief of United States Army Engineers, said today "many rivers and harbors construction projects could not be started in 1940 because the $173,973,050 program before Congress is so far below the $401,444,660 expenditure recommended."

Schley said work could begin on some of the larger river and harbor projects as soon as funds become available.

"On the inland waterway system," Schley added, "plans are ready for new work on the Illinois waterway, dredging and dike construction on the Missouri River, construction of two locks of the upper Mississippi River project, and construction of two locks at St. Anthony Falls.

Do we prefer to spend money for war or for such pressing domestic needs as Schley describes? And I mean just that, for up in our section the situation is critical and becoming more so all the time because of failing industry, low farm prices, high living costs, and unemployment caused by unjust and discriminatory freight rates, and lack of adequate water-transportation facilities, such as are enjoyed by most other sections of the Nation, and especially since the advent of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Panama Canal.

As a good indication of our problem I insert herewith an article from the Minneapolis Star-Journal dated February 9, which is headed as follows: Government aids one in three here.

GOVERNMENT AIDS ONE IN THREE HERE—SUMMARY OF FITERMAN'S REPORT SHOWS EXTENT OF PUBLIC AID

Disclosure that 920,348 persons in Minnesota—34.7 percent of the State population—are dependent, directly or indirectly, on Government, is made in the final summary of a public-welfare survey by Harry Fiterman, Minneapolis tax consultant and finance analyst.

The figure is based on a public-welfare case load of 211,086 and a total of 126,000 Federal, State, and local employees.

The Government workers include 15,000 Federal, 19,000 State, and 92,000 local government, the latter group including 52,000 elected and 40,000 appointed.

The welfare load break-down: W. P. A., 66,000; relief and miscellaneous (State), 35,000; old-age assistance, 63,733; children, 14,495; blind, 658; institutions, 17,000; war veterans, 14,200.

Conditions such as these give us cause to think, but if this $2,000,000,000 expenditure for national defense would really give us peace, it would be worth it. But it will not, and we should not fool ourselves, or try to fool the public into believing such a thing. It will not guarantee peace; it just makes it possible for us to fight better. When war comes, as come it will, if we do not turn over a new leaf and stop following false cures and panaceas and start building a real program for peace, we will have that much better start, and that is about the best you can say for such a program as is being offered here. No preparedness of whatever size or magnitude has kept England, France, or Russia from war, nor will it us, or anyone else in the long run, if we are so bankrupt in mental, moral, and spiritual resources as to put our ultimate trust in that sort of program for peace.

No, we should either do one of two things, if we are to be consistent, either spend two or three times as much as we propose to do, so as to be really invincible, and consequently less attractive meat for attack, or else we should come to our senses and get a real program, and stop this wasteful extravagance, dilly-dallying, and foolishness.

Not a program of words either, such as I notice in the news article reporting the recent action taken at the American Youth Congress, in which they are reported as follows:

The Youth Congress assembly planned a peace demonstration April 6 and drafted a message to the youth of 52 countries, asking help to "get our brothers out of the trenches and keep ourselves out."

The April 6 demonstrations, on the anniversary of United States entry into the World War, will include a referendum on war. Twin ballot boxes will be erected in prominent places, one black and inscribed with skull and crossbones, for ballots in favor of war; the other will be white, for ballots of peace.

Such resolutions sound good and look good in print, but it is doubtful if there is much practical value in taking a ballot such as proposed. Upon analysis it looks a lot like the sort of ballots Stalin has in Russia and Hitler in Germany. I cannot believe America is ready yet for such procedure, but I do feel that our people are ready for a real peace program.

WHY BE ENSNARED WITH FURTHER ILLUSIONS?

A good illustration of the impracticality of our past and present programs to stop this business of war is found in this little clipping I just saw in a Washington paper. A good title for the article would be "Business is Business." It is found in a report of action taken at the meeting of the American Jewish Congress and I quote as follows:

Dr. Joseph Tenenbaum, boycott committee chairman, reported that large quantities of United States copper are sent to Mexico on American ships and reloaded on Russian freighters for Vladivostok, eventually destined for Germany. He added that German goods are sent to Belgium, Holland, etc., repacked, relabeled and sent to the United States as neutral products.

This is only one of many illustrations which one might offer to show how impossible it is to stem the tide of war either by neutrality laws, attempts at isolation, tirades against the munitions makers, investigations of the international bankers, or in any other of the hundred and one simple ways we have used and are still trying to use to keep this country safe from war. No; we must stop having illusions, we must have something different.

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert a part of the remarks made last November just after our passage of the so-called neutrality bill, and which it seems to me is the one solution we must come to in this new world era in which we now find ourselves enmeshed. This is my suggestion for a real peace program:

Mr. Speaker, 181 against to 243 for is the sad record of the roll-call vote this afternoon, November 2, 1939, in the House of Representatives on the question of repeal of the embargo against the sale of arms and munitions of war. My heart sinks when I realize the meaning of such a vote. I was never so forlorn or so filled with despair as I am tonight as I approach the thankless task of trying to pick up the wreckage after the storm, to use a descriptive phrase with which we are all familiar.

I know of no better time, however, than right now to start to build on the broken pedestal of hope for a real peace after the war which we cannot escape, I fear, after the action of the House today.

In a great majority of the hundreds of speeches I have made on many and varied occasions in the past 12 years I have stated that there is a way to real and lasting peace, a way as yet untried, a way open to us after all else—all human experimentation—has failed—a sure way, because it is the way appointed by the Creator of Mankind.

I suggested it in my address in the House on February 22 last, entitled "Is Democracy in Guam?" again on May 9, in my "The Only Road to Peace"; also in my neutrality address of June 28, and again yesterday, when I suggested in my remarks before the House that we should, as a corollary to our vote here today, demand the right to write the terms of the next treaty of peace when this war has finally burned itself out after years of destruction.

The future welfare of this Nation and of humanity in general greatly depends on how well we write that peace treaty; consequently, I want to cut the pattern for it now, to set out a formula. I want to have it ready for the great minds—if any be left then—who will sit around the peace table in that day and year, after travail and shedding of blood have wrought the reform we need, and have burned the word "honesty" into our hearts and souls, which the oratory of the Congress could not do this year, even though supported by the voices and letters of thousands of our citizens begging us not to traffic in war materials.

GUIDING PRINCIPLES OF A NEW WORLD ORDER

Shall we strive to attempt or venture to obtain a glimpse of the first streaks of the promised dawn that must, in the fullness of time, chase away the gloom that has encircled humanity? Let me point out in broad outline what appears to be the guiding principles underlying a new world order.

That the unrest and suffering afflicting the mass of mankind are in no small measure the direct consequences of the World War and attributable to the unwisdom and short-sightedness of the framers of the peace treaties, only a biased mind can refuse to admit. It would be idle, however, to contend that the war, with all the losses it involved, the passions it aroused, and the grievances it left behind, has solely been responsible for the unprecedented confusion into which almost every section of the civilized world is plunged at present.

Is it not a fact—and this is one of the ideas I desire to bring out—that the fundamental cause of this world unrest is attributable, not so much to the consequences of what must sooner or later come to be regarded as a transitory dislocation in the affairs of a continually changing world, but rather to the failure of those into whose hands the immediate destinies of peoples and nations have been committed, to adjust their system of religious, economic, and political institutions to the imperative needs of a rapidly evolving age? Are not these intermittent crises that convulse present-day society due primarily to the lamentable inability of the world's recognized leaders and preachers to read aright the signs of the times, to rid themselves of their preconceived ideas and fettering creeds, and to reshape the machinery of their respective governments or positions according to a new standard—the standard that is implicit in the declaration of the oneness of mankind—the chief and distinguishing feature of the faith Christ proclaimed? Consider that question carefully and see if your answer is not the same as mine. Do you not recall that in every dispensation the light of divine guidance has been focused on one central theme? In this glorious century of ours the foundation of the faith of God and the distinguishing feature of His law are the evidences and the consciousness of the oneness of mankind.

How pathetic indeed are the efforts of all those leaders of human institutions who, in utter disregard of the spirit of the age, are striving to adjust national processes, suitable to the ancient days of self-contained nations, to an age which must either achieve the unity of the world or perish. At so critical an hour in the history of the world, great and small, whether in the east or in the west, whether victors or vanquished, whether aggressors or peacemakers, all must give heed to this clarion call and arise manfully to carry out in its entirety the one remedial scheme He, the Divine Physician, has prescribed for an ailing humanity. Let them discard, once for all, every preconceived idea, every national prejudice or human subterfuge, and give heed to this sublime counsel.

WE NEED A UNITED STATES OF THE WORLD

Here in America, I am convinced, we can best serve our country by striving in our capacity as citizens to assist in the eventual application of the principle of federalism underlying our own Government, to the relationships now existing between all the peoples and nations of the world, so that we may have a United States of the World.

Such an ideal requires great leadership. True civilization will unfurl its banner in the midmost heart of the world whenever a certain number of its distinguished and high-minded leaders—the shining exemplars of devotion and determination—shall, for the good and happiness of all mankind, arise with firm resolve and clear vision to establish in this way the cause of real and universal peace—universal peace, and not the fake, nationalistic peace most of us have been pursuing without satisfactory results. The cause of peace must be made the object of general consultation, built on a union of the nations and peoples of the world. We must conclude a binding treaty and establish a covenant, the provisions of which shall be sound, inviolable, and definite. It must be proclaimed to all the world and obtain the sanction of all the human race. This supreme and noble undertaking—the real source of the peace and well-being of all the world—should be regarded as sacred by all that dwell on earth. All the forces of humanity must be mobilized to insure the stability and permanence of this great covenant, the world's great need. In such an all-embracing pact the rights and limitations of each and every people and nation should be clearly fixed, the principles underlying the relations of governments toward one another definitely laid down, and all international agreements and obligations ascertained and determined.

In like manner the size of the armaments of every government should be strictly limited, for if the preparations for war and the military forces of any nation should be allowed to increase they will arouse the suspicion of others. The fundamental principle underlying this solemn pact should be so fixed that if any government later violates any one of its provisions all the governments on earth should rise to reduce it to utter submission; nay, the human race as a whole should resolve, with every power at its disposal, to destroy that government. Should this greatest of all remedies be applied to the sick body of the world, it will recover from its ills and will remain safe from war, without the least bit of doubt.

INDOMITABLE DETERMINATION REQUIRED

Some timid souls, unaware of the power latent in human endeavor, consider this suggestion as highly impracticable; nay, even beyond the scope of man's utmost efforts. Such is not the case, however. On the contrary, thanks to the unfailing grace of God, the loving kindness of His favored ones, and the unrivaled endeavors of wise and capable souls, nothing whatsoever can be regarded as unattainable. Endeavor, ceaseless endeavor, is required. Nothing short of an indomitable determination can posibly achieve it. Many a cause which past ages have regarded as purely visionary now in this day has become an accomplished fact. Why should this most great and lofty cause—the cornerstone of true civilization, of the advancement, the well-being, and the success of all humanity—be regarded as impossible of achievement?

THE LIGHTS OF UNITY

In cycles gone by, though harmony was established, yet, owing to the absence of means, the unity of all mankind could not have been achieved. Continents remained widely divided, so that, even among the peoples of one and the same continent, association and interchange of thought were well-nigh impossible. Consequently understanding and unity amongst all the peoples and kindreds of the earth were unattainable.

In this day, however, means of communication have multiplied and the five continents of the earth have virtually merged into one. In like manner all the members of the human family, whether peoples or governments, cities or villages, have become increasingly interdependent. For none is self-sufficiency any longer possible or desirable, inasmuch as political ties unite all peoples and nations, and the bonds of trade and industry, of agriculture and education are being strengthened every day. Time and space have virtually been eliminated as elements in world conditions. Hence the unity of all mankind can in this day be achieved. Actually this is none other but one of the wonders of this wondrous age, this glorious century. Of this, past ages have been deprived. This century—the century of light—has been endowed with the miraculous unfolding of a fresh marvel every day, but none greater than that which I have just described, because it makes possible the true road to peace.

"But," I hear someone say, "there will be opposition." Yes; there is and will be; and yet are we not justified in deriving fresh encouragement when we observe that the very consideration of such proposals is in itself an evidence of their steady growth in the minds and hearts of men? In the organized attempts that are made to discredit so exalted a conception, are we not witnessing the repetition, on a large scale, of those stirring struggles and fierce controversies that preceded the birth, and assisted in the reconstruction, of our own present unified action in this country?

THE FEDERATION OF MANKIND

To pursue this illustration further, how confident were the assertions made in the days preceding the unification of the States of the North American Continent regarding the insuperable barriers that stood in the way of their ultimate federation. Was it not widely and emphatically declared that the conflicting interests, the mutual distrust, the differences of government and habit that divided the States were such as no force, whether spiritual or temporal, could ever hope to harmonize or control?

And yet, how different were the conditions prevailing a hundred and fifty years ago from those that characterize present-day society! It would, indeed, be no exaggeration to say that the absence of those facilities which modern scientific progress has placed at the service of humanity in our time made of the problem of welding the American States into a single federation, a task infinitely more complex than that which confronts a divided humanity in its efforts to achieve the unification of all mankind into a united states of the world.

Upon the consummation of this colossal and glorious enterprise will depend the fulfillment of the prophecies uttered by the prophets of old when swords shall be beaten into plowshares and the lion and the lamb lie down together. It alone can usher in the kingdom of the Heavenly Father as anticipated by the faith and by the prayer of Jesus Christ, whose main point in His philosophy proclaimed the oneness of mankind. Surely the world, contracted and transformed into a single highly complex organism by the marvelous progress achieved in the realm of physical science, by the world-wide expansion of commerce and industry, and struggling under the pressure of world economic forces, amidst the pitfalls of a materialistic civilization, stands in dire need of a restatement of the truth of that philosophy.

Into such a period and condition, overshadowed by such moral and solical gloom, we are now steadily and irresistibly moving whether we will it so or not. Amidst the shadows which are increasingly gathering about us we can faintly discern the glimmerings appearing fitfully on the horizon of history. To us, the generation of the half light, living at a time which may be designated as the period of the incubation of the world commonwealth, has been assigned a task whose high privilege we can never sufficiently appreciate and the arduousness of which we can as yet but dimly recognize. We may well believe, we who are called upon to experience the operation of the dark forces destined to unloose a flood of agonizing afflictions, that the darkest hour that must precede the dawn of the golden age of our faith has about struck.

UNIVERSAL FERMENT

If we view the world carefully, we cannot miss the clear evidence of that universal fermentation which, in every continent and in every department of human life, be it religious, social, economic, or political, is purging and reshaping humanity in anticipation of the day when the wholeness of the human race will have been recognized and its unity established.

A towfold process, however, can be distinguished, each tending in its own way and with an accelerated momentum, to bring to a climax the forces that are transforming the face of our planet. The first is essentially an integrating process, while the second is fundamentally disruptive. The former, as it steadily evolves, unfolds a system which may well serve as a pattern for that world polity toward which a strangely disordered world is continually advancing, while the latter, as its disintegrating influence deepens, tends to tear down, with increasing violence, the antiquated barriers that seek to block humanity's progress toward its destined goal. The constructive process stands associated with the faith of Jesus and is the harbinger of the new order which that faith must ere long establish. The destructive forces that characterize the other should be identified with a secular civilization that has refused to answer to the expectation of this new age and is consequently falling into chaos and decline.

A titanic struggle, unparalleled in its magnitude, yet unspeakably glorious in its final consequences, is being waged as a result of these very opposing tendencies. The hollow and outworn institutions, the obsolescent doctrines and beliefs, the effete and discredited traditions which these forces represent, have, in certain instances, been undermined by virtue of their senility, the loss of their cohesive power, and their own inherent corruption. The perversion of human nature, the degradation of human conduct, the corruption and dissolution of human institutions, reveal themselves, under such circumstances, in their worst and most revolting aspects. Human character is debased, confidence is shaken, the nerves of discipline are relaxed, the voice of human conscience is stilled, the sense of decency and shame is obscured, conception of duty in both high and low places, of solidarity, of reciprocity, and loyalty are distorted, and the very feeling of peacefulness, of joy, and of hope is gradually extinguished.

ELEMENTS OF A DECADENT SOCIETY

The reappearance of religious intolerance, of racial animosity, and of patriotic arrogance; the increasing evidences of selfishness, of suspicion, of fear, and of fraud; the spread of terrorism, of lawlessness, of drunkenness, and of crime; the unquenchable thirst for, and the feverish pursuit after, earthly vanities, riches, and pleasures; the weakening of family solidarity; the laxity in parental control; the lapse into luxurious indulgence; the degeneracy of art and music, the infection of literature, and the corruption of our press; the extension of the influence and activities of those "prophets of decadence" who refuse to regard the procreation of children as the sacred and primary purpose of marriage, who denounce religion as an opiate of the people, who would, if given free rein, lead back the human race to barbarism, chaos, and ultimate extinction—all these appear as the outstanding characteristics of a decadent society, a society that must be either reborn or perish.

With this situation, compare and consider the character and philosophy of Christ. Instead of the recrudescence just described, He pushed every good trait of human character and condition of life to its utmost limit of perfection. His forgiveness was unbounded; His generosity was untiring; His patience was inexhaustible; His mercy was immeasurable; His courage was illimitable; His wisdom was unfathomable; His kindness was interminable; His faith removed mountains; His hope had no shadow in it; His love was infinite.

Of these two pictures of a pattern for life and for a basis for social, economic, political, and religious stability and success and peace, which do you choose as the ultimate winner? Does anyone doubt which philosophy of life will be the eventual winner? And then remember that the central feature in the real Christian philosophy points and leads to the unification of the whole of mankind.

Unity of family, of tribe, of city, State, and Nation have been successively attempted and fully established. World unity is now the final goal toward which a harassed humanity is slowly striving. Nation building seems to have come to a standstill, except perhaps temporarily and artificially by force of arms. The anarchy inherent in state sovereignty when carried to its ultimate is moving us all toward a climax. A world growing to maturity must abandon this fetish, in the interest of all our fellow men, recognizing the oneness and wholeness of human relationships, and establish once for all the machinery that can best incarnate this great fundamental principle of its life.

We blame the munitions makers, the international bankers, crooked diplomats, and unwise statesmen for war. But what, if they are the cause, are we going to do about it? After so placing the blame, it seems to me that we have done absolutely nothing about it of a constructive nature. All corrective measures at least have failed. By the vote of this Congress we have even removed the restrictions against the sale of munitions. Is it not evident, therefore, that something new and untried must be the answer, rather than the false cures and remedies we have so unsuccessfully sought to apply?

How can we control international problems except with international machinery? Our mistake is that we have tried to do it with local or national laws. I suggest an international organization for peace and contend that the preordained unity of the human race implies the establishment of a world commonwealth in which all nations, races, creeds, and classes are closely and permanently united, and in which the autonomy of its state members and the personal freedom and initiative of the individuals that compose them are definitely and completely safeguarded as we have here in the United States.

This commonwealth must, so far as I can visualize it, consist of a world legislature, whose members will, as the trustees of the whole of mankind, ultimately control the resources of the component nations, and will enact such laws as shall be required to satisfy the needs and adjust the relationships of all races and peoples.

A world executive, backed by an international police force contributed on a proportional basis, will aid in preserving the peace of the world and in seeing that its international laws are obeyed and its organic unity is safeguarded. A world tribunal must adjudicate and deliver its compulsory and final verdict in all disputes arising between the various nations. That would be better than settling disputes by war, would it not? At least, that is the way we settle disputes in this country between States and between people, so I assume it is a qualified method.

A world script, a world literature, a uniform and universal system of currency, of weights and measures, will simplify education, trade, and business problems, and will produce a better, friendlier understanding among the nations and races of mankind. In such a world society, science and religion, the two greatest forces in human life, could be reconciled and would work together, instead of out of harmony as they seem to be now as we practice the art of war.

If these words and thoughts which I have expressed are not true, and if they are not in complete accord with the experience and wisdom of the ages; if they are not in accord with the eternal laws of the Creator, then they can but fail of realization. But if they are true, then is it not the duty of yourself and all of us to bring them into fruition and realization with every ounce of energy and talent at our command and in the name of peace?

Monica Williams has penned a poem just fitted for this occasion. What more fitting conclusion can I append than this:

"LOVE WILL NOT FAIL

"There are no words with which to voice our grief
That war has come—no tears with which to weep,
For hearts in anguish a deep silence keep,
And minds are lulled to kindly unbelief.
It cannot be! There is no laurel wreath,
No joyous song of triumph that will leap
From muted throats; we know we can but reap
The sorrow which all cruel wars bequeath.

"And yet we wonder why such things must be;
Have we but built our house upon the sand,
Is there no good that evil shall prevail,
No God of Love to guide humanity?
Then let us look within and understand
That when we serve God first love will not fail."

For the past several weeks I have received daily commendations for the above suggestion, and requests from all over America have come in totaling several thousand copies. The following letter from the head of one of the greatest grain companies in Minneapolis is very pleasing to me, knowing the type of gentleman the writer, Mr. A. C. Andrews, is, and I insert it here to indicate how thinking, wise, and patriotic Americans are beginning to feel about the idea of a United States of the World:

ANDREWS GRAIN CO.,
Minneapolis, Minn., February 14, 1940.

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ALEXANDER: A week or so ago I received from you copy of the page from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of date November 2, your remarks about the world political situation, "After the War, Peace."

It is seldom I read clear through sheets of this kind that occasionally come to my desk. Usually I glance at them a bit and either toss them in the wastebasket or file them until I have more leisure time to peruse. But this article of yours compelled my attention from the very start, clear through to the end. And I certainly want to congratulate you on such a broad-gage view as you have taken. It is so hard for most of us to look beyond our immediate confines—either State or Nation.

I feel we must, all of us, take a broader than even national view alone before we will ever get peace and prosperity even for our own country.

Am very glad, indeed, you are thinking along the lines indicated in this congressional article.

Sincerely yours,

A. C. ANDREWS.

In conclusion, let me say that as long as our leaders can keep the hearts of America's men and women heavy with fear of the present and future alike, with jealousies and rivalries that are suckled from the breast of untruth, of sophistry, and chicanery—as long, I say, as we are blind to truth, to realities, and to the cold, practical facts which surround not only the lives of individuals but also of nations—then there is no hope of peace, there will be no peace, either for the United States or for the world.

Oh, yes, this is radical doctrine, but so was Abraham Lincoln's at the time, so were the doctrines of the Revolutionary fathers which brought forth on this continent a new, great hope for mankind, and so is Christianity itself, as the rich young ruler found when he talked to Christ. But how are we to save ourselves and to grasp the garment of sweet and wonderful peace but by doing eventually as I suggest? Why not now? Next year may be too late. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM].

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, dredging items for the island of Guam have been carried in naval appropriation bills since 1906, namely, in the Naval Act of 1906, in the Naval Act of 1907, in the Naval Act of 1916, and in the Naval Act of 1924. Those acts all carried dredging items for Guam harbor, although they were in comparatively small amounts. All of the objections to unauthorized work at Guam would apply also to items in the naval bills of the years mentioned. When did the American Congress ever before refuse to authorize necessary work on their island possessions to insure safety of human lives, because it might irritate or offend some foreign nation? I cannot understand the reasoning in such an argument. You have before you a map of Guam showing the Apra Harbor and obstructions therein. It is proposed to dredge out coral heads and build a breakwater. The work is designed solely for the purpose of furnishing a safe landing place for trans-Pacific aviation, for the safety of American aviators, and for the protection of American shipping. There is no element of fortification involved in the appropriation. There is no reason whatever that any other agency than the Navy should supervise work in this area. It is governed by the Navy and the Navy has the personnel at hand to do the work. In the interest of economy and efficiency of operation it ought to be done exactly as provided for in the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. HILL moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, there is no question that we have authorization to appropriate this money. There is no question that we own this island. There is no question that we have no fear of fortifying it if we want to do so. But I want to add that we have also the right to insist on the freedom of the seas. Yet you and I recognize the fact that it is folly to do so. We had better stay at home. The same thing, I believe, is true of fortifying Guam. It is not a matter of right; it is a matter of wisdom and good sense.

I am opposed to this fortification—and that is what I am going to call it—first, because I believe it tends to lead us eventually into war. I think a large overwhelming majority, probably over 90 percent of the American people, insist that we do everything in our power here in Congress to prevent going into war.

The second reason why I am opposed to this is that it is economically unsound. It has been proven here that the amount will not be $3,000,000 but will be twice that before we get through fortifying and guarding it.

Third. We are going to spend this money, if this item remains in the bill, as has been shown on these charts, to fortify an island 6,000 miles from our shores. Had we not better spend that money here at home?

Only last week the American Youth Congress met here. Whether we take sides on that question one way or the other is immaterial. I do not approve of some of the things they stand for as far as it concerns communism. I am against communism, as well as fascism and nazi-ism. However, they came looking for jobs. They want jobs. They have a right to demand jobs. Yet we are here proposing to spend $3,000,000, 6,000 miles away, when these young men and women are asking for employment when they come out of high school. There is nothing more tragic in America today than youth looking in vain for an opportunity to earn a livelihood, self-respect, and decent homes.

Further, we can use some of this money for soil conservation. Funds for this worth-while program have been cut and cut to the bone. Our projects that have been started in the West have been cut in half—in some cases cut two-thirds. We are asking that these projects be continued and finished on scheduled time. Yet the committee wants to spend this money far afield—away across the Pacific Ocean.

I was only a lad when the Spanish-American War was fought, but there was a great Democrat in that day who was opposed to imperialism. His name was William Jennings Bryan. We started our policy of imperialism then, and now we are reaping the results. We should never have gone into the Philippines, and, at the earliest possible moment, should get out of the Philippines, and we should get out of Guam. We should stay here at home, which includes the Aleutian Islands, Hawaii, and the Panama Canal.

Someone has mentioned here that this work on Guam is not fortification. A rose with another name has the same perfume still. A member of the committee said he is not for fortification, yet another member said very emphatically on the floor, "Yes; we want to make it a Gibraltar"; and that is the tendency.

Mr. Chairman, we need to keep our minds and our common sense here this afternoon and insist on spending our efforts and our money here at home, where they are needed for unemployment, for the young people, and for soil conservation.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BATES of Massachusetts. If improving this harbor in Guam would have the commercial advantages we are led to believe it would have, why not let provision for this improvement go through a committee of the House to determine its economic justification?

Mr. HILL. That would be more proper. However, it is immaterial to me from what committee this item comes. I am going to vote against it because I do not believe in spending any funds in Guam or in the Philippines. I believe in staying here in America and using any funds available for adequate defense, for construction of necessary dams, for soil conservation, for unemployment, for American development, and American people. [Applause.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the preferential motion.

Mr. Chairman, I just wish to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the labor involved in the expenditure in this item is all American labor, not foreign labor. The argument that the money is not to be used for employing American labor is entirely without merit.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the preferential motion offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RICHARDS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RICHARDS) there were—ayes 111, noes 91.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. RICHARDS and Mr. SCRUGHAM.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 123, noes 114.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 40, line 18, for the purpose of offering an amendment, which I send to the desk. This is purely for correcting the total as a result of the amendment just adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: Page 40, line 18, after the first dollar mark, strike out "42,638,475 (composed of 'A' item $41,788,475, and 'B' item $850,000)" and insert "41,638,475 (composed of 'A' item $40,788,475, and 'B' item $850,000)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized (and appropriated for in part), and for the commencement of the following vessels authorized by the act approved May 17, 1938 (52 Stat. 401–403), one battleship, one aircraft carrier, two cruisers of subcategory (b), eight destroyers, two submarines, one submarine tender, one seaplane tender, two small seaplane tenders, and one minesweeper, and for the following vessels authorized by the act of March 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 501), one battleship and four submarines, $259,071,979, to remain available until expended, of which sum $50,000,000 shall be immediately available: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of the amount available for expenditure under the head of "Construction and machinery" for the fiscal year 1941 for employees in the field service assigned to group IV (b) and those performing similar services carried under native and alien schedules in the Schedule of Wages for Civil Employees in the Field Service of the Navy Department shall not exceed 5 percent of the aggregate amount available under this heading on July 1, 1940: Provided further, That, of the appropriations made available by this act under the head of "Replacement of naval vessels," there shall be available such sums as the Secretary of the Navy may from time to time determine to be necessary for the engagement of technical services, and the employment of personnel in the Navy Department and in the field, the purchase of plans, drafting and other supplies, telephone and telegraph expenses, and the expenses of printing and travel, in addition to those otherwise provided for, owing to the construction of vessels which have been or may hereafter be authorized.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICH: On page 55, line 1, strike out the words "one battleship", and on page 55, line 7 strike out "$259,071,979" and insert "$258,571,979."

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment here to stop the laying down of the keel of one large battleship. If we carry out this appropriation as it is presented in this bill, we will have under construction 10 battleships, 9 cruisers, 3 aircraft carriers, 50 destroyers, 26 submarines, and many other naval vessels too numerous to mention in the time I have allotted to me.

There seems to me a great increase in the number of capital ships that we are contemplating the construction of and authorization for in this bill. My reason for asking for the elimination of this ship is because it is a 45,000-ton vessel and the cost, as was estimated by the Navy Department, is from $90,000,000 to as high as $115,000,000—no definite figure of cost.

If you are going to construct 10 large battleships, you should consider the hearings, which show that some of the ships that will very shortly be completed have been stated by naval officials to be perhaps antequated, except insofar as they can compete with a vessel of a similar type; and it seems to me that we ought to have somebody from the Navy or from this committee tell us what it is going to cost to maintain our Navy 5 years from now. I have been trying to get these figures, but I cannot find anybody that will give the estimated cost of the Navy 5 years hence—a terribly lax situation; very unbusinesslike.

This is the largest Navy appropriation bill we have had at any one time in the history of this Nation, notwithstanding the fact that the committee has probably done a very good job in cutting it down from what the Bureau of the Budget or the President's Office wanted for naval construction. They wanted more than one hundred million more to be spent. I ask them, Where will they get the money?

What are we building this great navy for? I am not a pacifist and I do not want anybody to charge me with being a pacifist, but I say that we need today more jobs, things constructive, more bread and butter for the people of this Nation rather than more battleships, more bullets, and more agencies of destruction; and it seems to me that there is no nation on the face of the earth that I know of, or no combination of nations, that will come here to attack America. If we stay at home and attend to our own business, we do not need to worry about people coming over here and getting after us. Be a friend to all people, and no need to worry about war. So why start the construction of so many capital ships? Who said we need them? Let us help agriculture; let us help the unemployed; let us help America.

This is not a political issue. There is no reason why the Democratic Party should be responsible for this, and there is no reason why the Republican Party should be responsible for this great construction program. It is simply a question of whether the Members of this Congress want to go on with this great building program, the largest building program this Nation has ever known. Your personal vote will determine. I will venture we do not have a roll call on the bill, because the Members who support this bill are ashamed of it.

We have reached a state, apparently, in our national life where we see each of the departmental appropriation bills being slashed, and if we permit the naval appropriation bill to go up by leaps and bounds—and you will have an Army appropriation bill which will be greatly increased—what are you Members of Congress going to do? What will you tell your constituents? You are the people who are responsible for this construction program, and if you permit it to go on, then it is your responsibility, and the people back home are going to hold you to your responsibility. I hope, at least, they do.

I believe that the greatest weapon of warfare, as well as the greatest instrument of our national defense, is our airplane. I believe that the airplanes and the local fortifications will keep people away from our shores. That will be defense enough, and enough to support with our present Navy.

Now, what is the Navy for? Is it not more likely to be used by those who are anxious to use it to go across and attack some foreign country rather than to try to protect our own shores? Certainly that is the case.

I hope the Members of the Congress will give consideration to this amendment. I would have cut out four or five of these vessels, but I wanted to go easy on this project and I am proposing to cut out only one battleship. Will you do it? [Applause.]

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote upon the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and Mr. RICH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered and the Chair appointed Mr. RICH and Mr. SCRUGHAM to act as tellers.

The Committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 109.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Neither the appropriation "Replacement of naval vessels, construction and machinery," nor the appropriation "Replacement of naval vessels, armor, armament, and ammunition," shall be available for expenditure for any work of any character (including material) undertaken upon ships commissioned prior to July 1, 1939, nor as to any ship commissioned subsequently to such date after 12 months shall have elapsed from commissioning date.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have a statement to make and a notice to serve which I want every department of the Government to absorb. We are getting altogether too many deficiency estimates. I want every department of the Government to realize that I, at least, shall oppose every deficiency appropriation next winter, if I happen to be a Member of the House, where it is based upon facts that were in the possession of the committee that held the hearings in connection with the determination of the amount of the appropriation. In other words, I expect every department, including the Navy Department, to so allocate its funds and divide them that they will last through the year 1941 for which they are appropriated. Also, I speak for a very large number of the members of the Committee on Appropriations who have had to bear with so many deficiency items. We feel that there must be better financial management on the part of the departments, and we feel that every outfit, including the Navy and the Army, must get along with the money that is appropriated for them by the Congress in accordance with law. [Applause.] So that there may be no misunderstanding, for replacement of naval vessels, in the fiscal year 1941, there is carried $290,000,000, and in this bill there is also carried $50,000,000, which is made available for replacement of naval vessels during the fiscal year 1940. I hope that every department of the Government will manage its business in accordance with law and not incur deficiencies.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Does not the gentleman understand that, in view of the language in the bill, we are taking $50,000,000 of the 1941 money and using it to carry on work for 1940?

Mr. TABER. I said that we were carrying in this bill $50,000,000, which is to be available for replacement of naval vessels in the fiscal year 1940, and the sum of $290,000,000 for expenditure in 1941. I understand that thoroughly, and I want the Navy Department and every other department of the Government to understand just how I feel. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Secretary of the Navy: Secretary of the Navy, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and other personal services, $205,990 (composed of "A" item, $202,570, and "B" item, $3,420).

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk, to correct a clerical error.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: Page 59, line 22, strike out "$205,990" and insert "$211,230", and strike out "$202,570" and insert in lieu thereof "$207,810."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hydrographic Office, $457,500 (composed of "A" item, $417,000, and "B" item, $40,500).

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. SCRUGHAM: Page 60, line 17, strike out "$457,500" and insert in lieu thereof "$458,820", and on page 60, line 18, strike out "$417,000" and insert "$418,320."

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to ask the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. SCRUGHAM] a question. We are increasing this bill a thousand dollars here and a thousand dollars there, and we have increased this bill some $50,000,000 over the naval appropriation bill of a year ago. The naval appropriation bill and the Army appropriation this year will be the largest appropriation bills that we have made in the history of the United States for our Army and Navy; and I ask the gentleman from Nevada, "Where are we going to get the money, or what kind of money will we use to pay these bills?" This may seem like a simple question, but it is most important to the welfare of our Nation. It is the real lifeblood of the Nation, to have a solvent country and sensible, sane people operating it for the best interest of all its citizens.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, that is a question which has been answered so many times that I think it does not need repetition. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nevada.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used for alterations to destroyers Nos. DD 409 to DD 444, inclusive, to improve stability.

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SCHULTE: On page 68, after line 21, add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 7. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used directly or indirectly after January 1, 1941, for the payment of any civilian for services rendered by them on the Canal Zone while occupying a skilled, technical, clerical, ministrative, or supervisory position unless such person is a citizen of the United States of America."

Mr. SCHULTE. Mr. Chairman, the reason for offering this amendment at this particular time is that it has been called to the attention of a great many Members by William C. Hushing, of the A. F. of L., that in the Panama Canal Zone there are any number of aliens, probably 5,000, who are not citizens of the United States and who are working for this Government and are being paid out of the Federal Treasury. In view of the fact that we have so much unemployment throughout the United States, practically every Member is receiving letters from his constituency that the people want jobs of some kind. I know that I have received any number of letters from my section of the country asking for jobs like this, and I certainly want to do everything I can for my people to see that they get employment. I have at least 500 in my district who will leave in the morning if they can be furnished with a job.

What the amendment does is to provide that all personnel on such construction work occupying skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, or supervisory positions shall be citizens of the United States.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield to my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], who has always been very sympathetic with labor and doing all he can to help them, and I know the workingman appreciates his efforts.

Mr. LANHAM. I am quite in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment and for several terms in this Congress I have endeavored to keep American employment for Americans. It seems to me to be especially important in the Canal Zone. It is far removed from us, and in these days of wars and rumors of war it behooves us to take every proper step for the security of our Nation and our defense.

I wish to ask the gentleman this question: In addition to giving this employment to Americans, is it not likely true that American citizens filling positions of the various kinds referred to in the gentleman's amendment are so much more efficient in their service that the compensation paid to them, while it may be greater per individual, would not likely be greater in the aggregate, in that a fewer number of American citizens could probably render these services than the aliens now employed in this important part of our governmental activity?

Mr. SCHULTE. Absolutely; without any question.

On August 11, 1939, the President approved an act of Congress, Public, 391, Seventy-sixth Congress, which authorized an appropriation of $277,000,000 for a new set of locks on the Canal Zone. This law contains the same language suggested in my amendment. In addition, on January 29, 1940, the House enacted H. R. 7941, which carried identical language and which applies to $42,000,000 worth of Army construction work on the Canal Zone.

The Senate Committee on Military Affairs has favorably reported without amendment H. R. 7941.

The several departments of the United States Government engaged in activities on the Canal Zone are all administered separately, but it is recognized that the provisions of the amendment proposed should apply to all these departments.

The law now calls for its application in the construction of the new set of locks.

The House has enacted and Senate favorably reported H. R. 7941, which will apply it to the Army construction work on the Canal Zone, and the amendment now proposed will apply it to the Navy's activities on the Canal Zone. In view of the previous actions of the House and Congress, as a whole it seems that no one should object to my amendment.

I wish to direct attention to letters directed to the Speaker of the House and to the chairman of the Senate Military Affairs Committee by the Secretary of War and to read therefrom a paragraph which shows that this has the approval of the President, the Director of the Budget, and the Secretary, and that it will not necessitate more appropriations, as Government investigators have found and officially reported that the West Indian alien employed on the Canal Zone is but 33 percent as efficient as an American workman.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LUDLOW. I think the gentleman is to be congratulated on offering this amendment. Since my colleague from Indiana became a Member of this body he has rendered constructive service of the highest order. He believes as a matter of sheer justice that Americans are entitled to these jobs at Panama, and I thoroughly agree with him. With thousands of unemployed at home imploring us for work, as good men as you and I, what excuse is there for giving these Panama positions to aliens? Furthermore, with the whole world aflame with actual or potential hostilities, we should put only Americans in charge at that delicate nerve center known as the Panama Canal. In offering this amendment, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE] has again shown what a fine American he is. It seems to me the merit of his amendment is very obvious, and I hope it will be adopted unanimously. I wonder if the gentleman knows how many aliens are employed down there?

Mr. SCHULTE. I do not have any idea, but it has been estimated anywhere from 5,000 up. They are aliens in every sense of the word. I feel as my friend and colleague the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] that American citizens are paying this money into the Federal Treasury, and certainly they expect that money to be paid out to Americans for American labor.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHULTE. I yield.

Mr. STEFAN. The amendment offered says nothing about common labor?

Mr. SCHULTE. No; but I wish that we could add common labor to this amendment as it would create about 5,000 more jobs for American citizens.

Mr. STEFAN. It merely refers to skilled labor?

Mr. SCHULTE. That is all.

Mr. STEFAN. I want to support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SCHULTE. That is all; just the skilled labor.

Now, here is a letter from the Secretary of War:

The passage of this legislation will require the use of appropriated moneys for the employment of American skilled labor and thereby help to relieve the unemployment situation within the United States. To that extent it will be an extension of the principle of taking care of American skilled labor as expressed in the act of August 11, 1939, authorizing the construction of additional facilities to the Panama Canal, and also to that extent it puts the Army construction work in question on a parity with the Panama Canal improvement. Insofar as the rate of wages paid the employees is concerned, the same parity will prevail as to employees employed by the Governor of the Canal to carry out that work.

It is not believed that the enactment of the proposed legislation will, from a practical viewpoint, result in any appreciable increased cost.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that there is no objection to the submission of this proposed legislation.

This situation was brought to my attention by the American Federation of Labor through their national legislative chairman, William C. Hushing, who has been trying for 21 years to correct this evil that exists in the Panama Canal Zone, that of aliens being employed by the Federal Government receiving their money from the Federal Treasury, and American citizens standing idly by wondering where their next meal was coming from.

William C. Hushing is known and respected by every Member of this House, and I would like to pay my compliments to him for giving to this amendment his untiring efforts, his tenacity, and willingness to continue to fight for the things that are for the best interests of those who must work for a living, and for his loyalty to the American workers.

I do hope this amendment will be accepted.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SCHULTE].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. RAYBURN) having resumed the chair, Mr. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8438, the Navy Department appropriation bill for 1941, directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. STEFAN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman qualifies.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STEFAN moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment as follows: On page 10, strike out all of lines 1 to 8, inclusive.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SCRUGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may have authority to correct the totals in the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

THE METHODS OF HITLER AND THE DISCIPLES OF STALIN ARE IN VOGUE HERE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, Hitler, through a measure of orderly and legal procedure, brought about a revolution and established himself as dictator in Germany. Stalin literally lopped off the heads of his political opponents and made himself supreme. The New Deal uses the methods of Hitler, applied by some of the disciples and adherents of Stalin, to bring about the overthrow of our Government and to create a draft-Roosevelt movement.

Congress enacted the National Labor Relations Act, creating the National Labor Relations Board. The President appointed a Board which conceived it to be its duty to drive all workers into industrial unions, adherents of which had contributed more than a million dollars to the political success of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The National Labor Relations Board selected, at a salary of $2,700 per year, a Hungarian woman, 27 years of age, who came to the United States in 1929, was naturalized in 1935, with a husband drawing a salary of $4,600 a year in another Government department, to act as a reviewing attorney—to read, consider, thousands of pages of testimony and then report to the Board her conclusions as to the decisions—affecting the jobs of thousands of men and the financial existence of great corporations—which should be made by the Board.

The Board, notwithstanding the provision found in section 4, subdivision (a), of the act creating it, which provides that—

Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statitsical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor—

Hired the Russian-born Saposs, as full of communistic ideas as a vagabond dog is of fleas, to make investigation outside the record and report to investigators, reviewing attorneys, and the Board itself his conclusions and interpretation of testimony given before the Board.

The procedure is in violation of every idea of fair play and of justice inherent in every American. The procedure is characteristic of the procedure of Stalin and his secret agents. The Board denies to employers accused of an unfair labor practice their day in court, the right to be confronted with the witnesses who testify against them, the right of cross-examination; in short, the right to be heard in their own defense.

As disclosed by the Smith hearings, one of the activities of Saposs seems to have been to inquire into the financial standing of the employers investigated by the Board, and, apparently, if the company was prosperous, a labor dispute, followed by a strike, was in order, and, when demands of the C. I. O. unions were not met and a strike followed, in the end the Board, bent upon inflicting punishment, made an order reinstating the strikers with payment for the time lost while on strike.

If, perchance, the employer was not making a profit, the testimony of Saposs, an economist, so-called, could be used to point out how, if the employer had operated his business properly, he would have made a profit, and therefore a demand for an increase in wages was justifiable.

Restated, Saposs' mission was to find evidence to show that an employer was making too much money; therefore a demand for increase in wages was justifiable; or, if it could not be shown that the employer was making a profit, then that his methods should be changed to correspond to Saposs' theories, and, in the meantime, an increase in wages should in any event be given.

With the aid of the Hungarian reviewing attorney and the Russian economic expert, the Board, biased and prejudiced, with the preconceived notion that its purpose under the law was to force all employers into a contract with representatives of the industrial union which harbored within its ranks many a Communist, buttressed by the reports of its investigators and prosecutors, has been able to build a broad foundation for its punitive orders.

These orders may be based upon hearsay, on reports made by investigators who traveled outside the record, who made statements considered by the reviewing attorney and by the Board when those charged with unfair labor practices had no opportunity to be heard or to answer.

Circuit courts of appeal have time and again said that the evidence upon which the Board bases its findings must be sound and substantial, not hearsay.

The Supreme Court last Monday inferentially rebuked the circuit courts of appeal and then decided that, when Congress passed the National Labor Relations Act and provided that—

> The findings of the Board, as to the facts, if supported by evidence, shall * * * be conclusive—

It intended to make the findings of the Board conclusive, if supported by evidence which was substantial.

The hearings before the Smith committee disclose that the Board conceives itself to be charged with the duty of forcing all industrial workers into a union. The hearings disclose that the purpose of the Board is to force an employer into the making of a collective-bargaining contract with a union, although the Supreme Court has distinctly said that an employer need not, under the act, make such a contract.

The hearings disclose that the Board has employed men like Dr. Saposs to make investigations and give opinions on which reviewing attorneys and the Board itself have based decisions, and this without affording the person charged with an unfair labor practice an opportunity to be heard—a procedure which is un-American but in conformity with the practice of Stalin.

The hearings before the Smith committee disclose that the Board's secretary has been a party to the instigation and the carrying on of a strike in a great industrial corporation's plants; that its trial examiners or reviewing attorneys have traveled outside the record in making up their reports, and considered information not given in hearings before them and which parties accused of a violation of the law had no opportunity to meet.

A BLACKJACKING BOARD

The Board has not been content to use the remedies given it by the National Labor Relations Act. By letters to other departments of the Government, it has sought to blackjack employers into entering into collective-bargaining contracts. The Chairman of the Board has been guilty of coercion and intimidation by writing to other departments of the Government, asking them to either withhold from giving, or to cancel contracts already given, to employers who were charged with, or who might be charged with, unfair labor practices.

Where successful and had the results of his efforts gone to him, instead of to the labor-union organizers and racketeers Chairman Madden would have been guilty of blackmail or extortion. The best that can be said for his conduct is that he did not himself receive financial reward; that the benefits went to his friends in the particular labor organization involved.

If administrative bodies are to continue to encroach upon the functions of Congress, of the courts, and of the Executive, it is about time that we abolish the lot and let some of those who conceive themselves to be czars start at the bottom of the ladder.

We now have proof in the testimony produced before the Smith committee of many of the things heretofore known but contradicted. We now know that the National Labor Relations Act has been used by the Board and its employees in an arbitrary, unlawful, and prejudiced manner to injuriously affect, and sometimes destroy, the jobs of workers; to deprive employees of the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing; to make unjust and ruinous orders against employers.

We now know that the overwhelming sentiment of our countrymen demands the amendment of this law. Evidence is piling up day after day that it is the purpose of powerful political groups to prevent the amendment of this law, to thwart the will of the people.

That the will of the people may be done, I have placed on the desk of the Speaker discharge petition No. 23 and, if the Members of this House want this law amended, they can get it amended by forcing out for consideration the bill I introduced in March a year ago. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 5 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARCANTONIO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise at this time to charge anybody with bad faith. Everybody is entitled to his constitutional prerogatives under the rules of the House. At the same time I think the RECORD should show a factual history of what occurred here on the matter of Members having an opportunity to register a protest vote in favor of a 10-percent cut and an opportunity of a record vote in favor of a 10-percent cut in this naval appropriation bill.

Under the rules, only one motion to recommit is permitted. A motion to recommit, under the rules, belongs to the minority. When the motion to recommit was offered by the minority we expected a motion to recommit that meant something. Instead the motion to recommit that was offered carried the recommendation to strike out the language on page 10 of the naval appropriation bill from line 1 to line 8, a most innocuous and meaningless motion to recommit, because all it would have stricken out is an appropriation for welfare and recreation for sailors. That amendment, therefore, in my opinion, was meaningless and absurd, perhaps not intentional, and I am not charging anybody with bad faith, because that would be contrary to the rules of the House; but it served the purpose, and that purpose was to prevent a motion to recommit which would have carried the recommendation for a 10-percent cut in the total appropriation. For one I was prepared to offer that motion, and had, in fact, sent it to the Clerk's desk, because I, too, am a member of a minority party, but, under the rules, the members of the major minority party had the preference to offer that motion. I put this in the RECORD so that the country may have a factual history as to how the Members of this House were deprived of an opportunity to record their vote in favor of a 10-percent cut in this all-time record Navy bill.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. There are a great many members of the second minority party, Republicans on this side of the House, who would have been very pleased to vote for the gentleman's motion to recommit so as to provide for a reduction of 10 percent of the total amount carried in this bill. I would have been happy to vote for a much greater reduction. There is no sense spending billions of dollars for the Army and Navy and in the name of economy taking it out of the hides of the hungry people who are unemployed or on W. P. A., our disabled war veterans, and distressed farmers.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I think the farmers who have been cut and the W. P. A. workers who are about to be let loose on the streets, left to hope and pray that the so-called war boom will take care of them, will read what I have inserted in the RECORD, and I hope they will realize just how their Representatives were deprived of the opportunity to vote for a 10-percent cut in the naval appropriation bill and thereby cast a vote in their behalf. Nine hundred and sixty-six million dollars for war and terrific reductions in appropriations for agriculture and labor. Why were we blocked in our effort to go on record on this vital matter?

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JENSEN. The gentleman is laying all the blame on the minority side. I am just wondering if the majority side did not have something to do with the procedure that has taken place.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am a minority of one and am in no position to know what alliances are made. I do not know if any were made on this particular question. I have my own ideas, however.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. How could the majority have anything to do with the action that was taken? It was purely within the control of the minority party, because under the rules of the House it is the right of the minority party to make a motion to recommit. If the gentleman who asked the question will follow his question to the final conclusion, he will realize he is indicting his own party if an agreement was made, because the agreement could not be consummated without the minority party having complete control of the situation.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I am not drawing any conclusions. I am simply setting forth the facts to let the country draw its own conclusions from the facts, which are uncontrovertible. You Democrats and you Republicans will have to fight it out to see who is to blame.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. I yield.

Mr. JENSEN. I should like to answer the gentleman from Massachusetts. Does not the majority side have the power to vote down any resolution or any motion that is offered? I notice they did not take any action.

Mr. McCORMACK. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Iowa ought to know there is only one motion to recommit allowed under the rules. Two such motions cannot be made. The same thing was done to me the other day. I know I would have opposed the motion of the gentleman from New York today and he would have opposed mine the other day when I tried to get the Ambassador back from Soviet Russia. The same thing was done the other day. It is within the rules. We are both recipients of the same play. Both situations were under the control of the minority party.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Yes; except this, that in the gentleman's case nobody was hurt, and in this case the farmers and the W. P. A. workers are hurt.

Mr. McCORMACK. The same principle is involved, however. The gentleman is trying to argue one way in this case and another way in the other.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. The gentleman from Massachusetts well knows that I had absolutely no control over the situation the other day and he cannot blame me for it; nor did I argue the other way the other day because I had no part in that argument. Furthermore, while the same principle may be involved, it is not the same people who are getting kicked around. In this case the farmers and the workers are getting the boot. The other day, only the gentleman from Massachusetts got the boot.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter and excerpts from a Supreme Court decision.

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a radio address delivered last night by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

SENATE

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1940

The Reverend Edward Gabler, S. T. D., rector of Christ Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O God, our Heavenly Father, who didst lead and guide the minds and hearts of our forefathers, accept our gratitude and thanks for the blessings and benefits Thou hast bestowed upon our native land.

Do Thou by Thy infinite wisdom guard and guide the Members of the Senate that they, through Thy Divine Help, may have a right judgment in all things. Take away from each one of us the hatred, prejudice, and fear that so easily sway our life and, in their place, may love, tolerance, and courage be the measure of our minds and hearts. Make us ever conscious of our duty toward Thee and our fellow man. Grant us, in all our uncertainties and doubts, to ask what Thou wouldst have us to do, that the spirit of wisdom may save us from all false choices, and in Thy light we may see light; and in Thy straight path, may not stumble. In His name. Amen.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolution of the Assembly of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Resolution 20

Whereas the United States of America has lately embarked upon a program of aviation expansion and to that end is cooperating with colleges and universities throughout the Nation in training students in flying; and

Whereas Chaffey Junior College and Pomona Junior College are now giving courses in aviation and conducting training programs for aviators pursuant to regulations of the Civil Aeronautics Authority; and

Whereas the Pomona-Ontario-Upland area of California is an especially advantageous locality for the training of aviators, in that it is in close proximity to Inglewood, Santa Monica, and Glendale, where much of the construction of aircraft is at present taking place, is free from fog and has ideal flying, climatic, and weather conditions, and is yet not so close to the Pacific coast as to cause an undesirable concentration of the aviation industry; and

Whereas the construction of an airport would greatly strengthen the aviation program of Chaffey Junior College and Pomona Junior College, be an important factor in promoting the aviation industry in California, and assist the national defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly of the State of California, That it hereby respectfully urges and memorializes the President, the Secretary of War, and the Congress of the United States to take such steps as are necesssary to establish an emergency landing field within a short distance of Chaffey Junior College and Pomona Junior College; and be it further

Mr. BARKLEY presented the following resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Whereas there are more than 45,000 miles of poorly maintained county-system roads in Kentucky, and a large mileage of same in other States of the Nation; and

Whereas much of this mileage of bad county roads is necessary for the rural free delivery of United States mails, and for transportation of children to distant schools; and

Whereas this tremendous mileage of bad roads is the only outlet for daily business, social, and other purposes, available for the great majority of the rural population of the country; and

Whereas many miles of this county-system road have been constructed and hard surfaced by W. P. A. labor and materials and by counties, and said large mileage of roads, thus improved, is suffering serious damage and disintegration for the want of maintenance, due to the lack of funds: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Kentucky (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be memorialized to enact all laws and amendments to existing laws, and to do all other things necessary to aid both in the speedy construction and the substantial maintenance of the said county-system roads of Kentucky and of other States of the Nation, for the urgent reasons and purposes herein set forth; be it further

Whereas the Federal Government has assisted cities of the United States, including Texas, in eradicating slums and establishing in their place safe and sanitary dwellings for families of low income who could not otherwise afford decent living quarters, and thereby convert what was once the seat of crime and disease to centers of health and good citizenship; and

Whereas there is now pending in Congress legislation which has already passed the Senate which will make it possible for the United States Housing Authority to continue this great work and extend it into the field of rural housing, and give low-income families on the farms of our Nation now living in unhealthful and unsafe substandard dwelling places, decent, safe, and sanitary homes in which to live; and

Whereas it is the mothers who bear the burdens of making the home the center of family life and good citizenship, and the Federation of Women's Clubs of Texas is interested in better living conditions for all homes in Texas and in the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Federation of Women's Clubs of Texas, That it endorses the United States Housing Authority program as carried on through the housing authorities of the different States of the Union, and as carried on in Texas, and that it endorse and urge the passage of the legislation and appropriation now pending in Congress to continue the United States Housing Authority's program, and to extend it into the rural areas of the Nation; be it further

Resolved, That the Federation of Women's Clubs of Texas memorialize, and it hereby does memorialize the legislature of Texas to add provisions to its present housing enabling act to provide for rural housing through the establishment of county housing authorities to operate in rural areas as do the city housing authorities of Texas at the present time in cities and towns by the aid of the Federal Government through the United States Housing Authority, or by other appropriate means remedy the defect in the Texas housing laws which now prevent such Federal aid to rural housing which is so greatly needed in our State; be it further

Resolved, That the Governor of this State, Hon. W. Lee O'Daniel, be and hereby is memorialized to include said legislation in any call which he may make for a special session of the legislature in order that the great Commonwealth of Texas may share in the Nation's program for better homes and better standards of living for those who till the soil and make it possible for us all to live from the products of their labor.

Respectfully submitted.

MRS. FLORENCE J. SCOTT.

[These names appeared on the resolution when it was presented by Mrs. Volney W. Taylor to the executive board for consideration and adoption. The resolution was adopted verbatim.]

Mr. PEPPER presented a resolution of the Board of County Commissioners of Duval County, Fla., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas under the provisions of the Federal Social Security Act no protection is afforded to governmental employees; and

Whereas under existing laws Federal, State, county, and city employees are amenable to the provisions of the income-tax law; and

Whereas it would seem that governmental employees, except those under pensions, should be afforded benefits of the Social Security Act or the set-up under the unemployment-insurance system: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this Board of County Commissioners of Duval County, Fla., does hereby commend to the Members of Congress from the State of Florida that they make an investigation of the matters and things set forth in the preamble of this resolution and, if after an investigation the same appears economically feasible, that they initiate such legislation as would bring about the inclusion of governmental employees under the Social Security Act protection and/or unemployment-insurance system; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each Member of the National Congress from the State of Florida.

PREVENTION OF AND PUNISHMENT FOR LYNCHING

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter from Rev. H. Francis McClure, minister of the Brown Chapel, African Methodist Episcopal Church of Parsons, Kans., urging enactment into law of the antilynching bill.

I cannot state too strongly my own position in support of this bill. I have sponsored and supported this proposed legislation for years. I think the lynching record of the United States is a disgrace to our civilization. I sincerely feel that in many localities the local authorities are unable to afford proper protection to those accused of crime, or, at any rate, do not do so. The mob concludes that the accused persons are guilty and then takes the law into its own hands.

This condition should not, must not, be allowed to continue. The colored people for whom Reverend McClure speaks are entitled to the protection of their Government; and I believe that the antilynching bill pending now in a Senate subcommittee will offer a strong incentive to better law enforcement by local officials. The House measure should be reported at an early date and passed by the Senate without amendment.

I send the letter to the desk and ask that it be printed in the RECORD at this time as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AFRICAN METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH,
Parsons, Kans., February 8, 1940.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Capitol Building, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: On behalf of the colored voters of this section of Kansas I am requested to write you and ask that you give the support of your honorable office to the pending antilynching bill now being considered by your honorable body.

We regard this very fine measure, not as legislation designed to benefit the American Negro alone, but as a further guarantee of the rights of the American people as prescribed, but not fully secured, by our Constitution. You are our highest representative in government and we feel that our request is in line and in perfect harmony with your fine judgment, and that you will support any move that may arise to limit debate and minimize the liability of a filibuster on the part of its opponents.

With abiding faith in your fine judgment and great courage we express to you in advance our sincere gratitude.

Respectfully yours,

H. FRANCIS MCCLURE,
Minister, Brown Chapel, A. M. E. Church, Parsons, Kans.

PROPOSED PUBLIC HEARINGS BY WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I desire to comment briefly on a bill which I am introducing at this time. The bill requires that hearings or meetings held by the Work Projects Administration with respect to the grievances of relief workers be open to the public.

It has long been a traditional American custom that any type of hearing on a matter of public concern is open to the general public and to the press.

At the instigation of a newspaperman in Wisconsin, I have investigated the policy of the Work Projects Administration regarding hearings on labor grievances and complaints. I am advised that the decision regarding public hearings "is one which necessarily must rest with the officials conducting such hearings."

According to the policy of the Administration, "it should be understood that an open hearing, attended by interested parties, is not necessarily a public hearing."

Quoting further:

> Decisions in these matters must be determined on the basis of requirements of good administrative practice. The experience of this administration does not support the claim sometimes made that the review of labor or other grievances should be public. Many of the issues involved are minor matters which can be determined by less elaborate procedure. The methods used in a review should be determined by the officials in charge on the basis of fairness and efficiency, and it has not been found that public hearings serve either objective.
> While it may be deemed expedient for this administration, as for other operating agencies of the Federal Government, to reserve the right to admit or exclude newspaper reporters, the press is not excluded from the findings.

This seems to be a fair enough procedure. I do not wish to intimate that the W. P. A. hearings are back-room star-chamber proceedings. I feel, however, that it is desirable to insure that the W. P. A. hearings be as democratic as possible.

W. P. A. and its administration have been subjected to much criticism. The grievance hearings of W. P. A. workers are rightly matters of public concern. The holding of hearings open to the public would be desirable not only in the interest of preserving a democratic procedure but also in the best interests of the W. P. A. itself.

So long as W. P. A. hearings are held in a manner which is free from politics, there is no reason why the meetings cannot be public. It is all very well for the W. P. A. to make their findings public after a hearing has been held. That does not explain how the findings have been reached. No court in the land could operate in that way. The mere publishing of a decision does not in any way indicate that the decision was entirely free from considerations of political expediency; and we know from what we heard in the last session of the Congress that too much attention was paid to political expediency. Reading the decision in no way indicates what factors have been weighed in writing it. Hearings where the press is excluded violate a very fundamental American concept.

When hearings deal with the human rights of unfortunate men who have been driven into the lowest class of W. P. A. labor, it is more than ever imperative that orderly, democratic, and public proceedings be held. The American worker in the low brackets of governmental work must not be reduced to the level of the serf. His rights must not be slaughtered on the altar of smug bureaucracy.

If there is politics in W. P. A. hearings, we want to know about it. If any unfair political considerations affect the findings of hearings for these unfortunates, we want to know about it.

Mr. President, at this time I introduce, for reference to the appropriate committee, a bill requiring that hearings or meetings held by the Work Projects Administration with respect to the grievances of relief workers be open to the public.

The bill (S. 3395) to require that hearings or meetings held by the Work Projects Administration with respect to the grievances of relief workers be open to the public was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have for a number of weeks felt it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that during the morning hour extended speeches should not be made, that it is a violation of the rule of the Senate. The practice has been indulged in on both sides of the Chamber, and I have no particular reference, of course, to the address made by the Senator from Wisconsin today, any more than to the remarks of other Senators. It seems that a habit is growing up of Senators seeking to make extended speeches during the morning hour, and I do not think that should be indulged in. The morning hour is set aside in order that the morning business may be proceeded with, and it seems to me that Senators who have addresses to deliver, political or otherwise, should wait until after the morning hour has been concluded.

I shall feel it my duty hereafter, regardless of who may seek to make an address during the morning hour, to make a point of order against any Senator who takes advantage of the morning hour to make an extended speech on any subject. Senators have a right to insert in the RECORD during the morning hour, under the proper heading, any communication, and describe what it is, but I certainly think that we should observe the rules of the Senate in regard to the conduct of business arising during the morning hour. I think I may say that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY], the minority leader, with whom I conferred about this matter some days ago, concurs in my view.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. Of course, the rules should be observed, and, so far as I am concerned, I usually try to have the rules and practices of the Senate followed. During the transaction of the routine morning business there should be no discussion or statement not having to do with the regular transaction of the business of the Senate. I am sure the Senator and I agree upon the value of orderly procedure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the two Senators who are leaders of their respective parties do not invoke the rule, the Chair will call attention to the fact that such a practice is a violation of the rules. But the Chair did not feel that he was obligated to call attention to the matter until the Senators expressed themselves as they have just done.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The routine morning business is closed. The calendar, under rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will proceed with the call of the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 58) providing that a calendar day's notice shall suffice in connection with suspension of a rule, was announced as first in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Over.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my attention was diverted. I had intended to ask unanimous consent that the calendar be called for action on unobjected-to bills and other measures.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before the call is proceeded with, I feel that I should state that the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. ANDREWS] last week gave notice that he desired to address the Senate this morning. I hope that the Chair will recognize the Senator from Florida to deliver his address at this time before we proceed with the call of the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Florida addressing the Senate at this time? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Florida is recognized.

PERMANENT OLD-AGE ASSISTANCE

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. President, on last Thursday I again gave notice that I would take up Senate Joint Resolution 145, introduced by me for myself and the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on June 5, 1939.

This amendment was considered by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary last summer, and on the 30th day of June 1939 it was reported out favorably by a vote of 10 to 6, and now constitutes No. 759 on the present Senate Calendar. It had been my purpose to discuss this important amendment before the close of the regular session last August or at the beginning of the special session which met in September, but due to an understanding between the executive department and the Congress, no matters other than the Neutrality Act were considered during the extra session. This is the first time I have had an opportunity, therefore, to present my views on this resolution to the Senate.

In view of the fact that there seems to be some doubt that Congress has the authority, even under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, to enact a law providing for levying a tax to be placed in a separate special fund and paid out only for a specific purpose, such as old-age assistance, it has occurred to us to submit this proposed constitutional amendment—Senate Joint Resolution 145—which, in simple terms, provides that "The Congress shall have power to levy taxes for old-age assistance." Under this amendment Congress would have undoubted authority to provide in due course a method of taxation deemed best advisable upon the amendment being ratified by three-fourths of the States.

The present method of combining appropriations of money for old-age assistance with that raised by a tax on pay rolls for other purposes under the Social Security Act has not been satisfactory but has been a source of much unfavorable comment among our citizens generally.

The rather meager funds provided under the Social Security Act by the Federal and State Governments are not only indefinite but admittedly inadequate in many instances to provide the bare necessities of life, even for the comparatively few who are able to qualify for old-age assistance under its provisions.

We are receiving hundreds of letters complaining of the inadequacy of the present program for old-age assistance from all sections of our country, and, since it is a matter of national interest, as it affects our old people, also our young who should be kept in school and under parental influence through youth's adolescent years, I feel that each State in this Union should have the opportunity to pass judgment upon whether a definite program of old-age security should be permanently provided by way of a constitutional amendment. We therefore submit this proposed amendment for the consideration of Congress, with the hope that favorable action will be taken at this Seventy-sixth Congress.

The amendment, if adopted and ratified, does not undertake to state the form nor the amount of the tax, but leaves that to be worked out in due course by act of Congress carrying it into effect.

When the financial crash of 1929, and the economic depression which followed, came upon us, it found many thousands of our once self-sustaining older citizens in a deplorable situation. They had carefully provided for the "rainy day," but had not anticipated one of the most destructive financial crashes in history.

Those persons over 55 or 60 years of age, and even younger, finding themselves in dire need, sought employment, but soon learned that it was practically impossible to obtain employment either in the industries or even with the Federal Government, and mainly by reason of their age.

It was apparently presumed that they were not able to perform either manual or mental labor in a way or manner satisfactory to those from whom they sought employment. Millions of these fine old American people, who have endured the cold winters and the noonday heat, are to be found in every State in the Union. Many thousands, coming from nearly every State in the Union, are passing their declining years in Florida and California to avoid some of the rigors of the colder climates.

It is not alone a problem of my State, or of any particular State. It is a Nation-wide problem. We have heard much in recent years about securing old age against want and poverty. Many felt that the Social Security Act would ultimately meet the requirements for relief for old age and unemployment, and no doubt it is a very long step taken in the right direction. We often hear the statement that its operation is a severe burden not only on small business but upon the laborer who should be the main beneficiary. It is now claimed by many that it is so complicated and the amounts so meager that a more simple and workable method of old-age assistance should be provided; in fact, has become necessary.

We might as well recognize this fundamental truth: That in a democracy like America the national security of our people in the ultimate is rooted in economic contentment. To retain that democratic security we must keep our human efforts and natural resources harnessed in productive work.

Religious liberty, political liberty, economic liberty—these liberties that have heretofore made America the land of opportunity and contentment are like the foundation of a great building. It is futile to try to save the upper stories when the foundation stones are crumbling.

We become astonished and surprised when we take time to analyze our economic and social conditions as they are. In the United States we have less than 8 percent of the world's population. But under normal conditions we use about one-half of the world's rubber, a fifth of its sugar, two-thirds of its silk, a third of its coal, half of its pig iron, half of its copper, and more than two-thirds of its crude oil.

We operate over half of the world's telephone and telegraph lines and units. We own more than three-quarters of the automobiles of the earth and a third of the world's railroads. We produce more than half of the wheat, cotton, lead, and zinc of the world.

Deep in the ground at Fort Knox, Ky., we have hidden more than half the world's most precious monetary metal. We have two-thirds of the world's banking resources. Our people have a purchasing power greater than that of the 500,000,000 people of Europe and considerably larger than that of the billion people who live in Asia.

No people excels us in inventive genius or capacity for constructive building. Having no more natural resources and raw materials than possessed by some of the other great nations, we have, in our relatively short history, created by our own industry the wealthiest nation on earth. Yet we are still in a depression that began nearly 10 years ago, with about one out of every seven of our citizens living off some form of relief or governmental salary. The present dilemma is a test of our ingenuity and economic leadership in the world.

For 2 years I have joined my efforts with others here in Congress to try to force better prices by restricting the production of the farm, factory, and the shop. We have tried to give labor better wages by restricting the output of the worker. We have tried to keep millions of able-bodied men and women in productive tasks by various forms of work created by rule of law. This administration—more than any other in our history—has tried to and has greatly helped the underprivileged by a spending process, yet we all admit that we cannot lift ourselves out of the depression's quagmire by our own bootstraps. Our national debt has now reached the point where it equals nearly two-thirds of our combined national income.

Through private and public borrowing we have sought to maintain our economic pace. The experiment would be more pleasing if it were not for the fact that the restrictions on output plus relief cannot be continued indefinitely.

Many feel that the establishment of a permanent plan of old-age assistance would, at the same stroke, better secure our youth through modern education and employment. Generous provisions for securing the comfort of the old, and broadening opportunities for the youth in other civilized countries have been found valuable throughout the experience of past ages.

Families did this in the past before the machinery age. For the nation to aid when the family breaks down is fundamentally sound. A failure to do so is dangerous. A democracy, even such as ours, exists by the will and support of the citizens composing it, and we should be able, with all the experience of the past few years, to apply the very sound old principle of supply and demand to new conditions.

Looking back a decade we find that the underlying, fundamental assumptions of both the Hoover and Roosevelt administrations are very much the same: That to spend or lend public money and restrict agricultural production would enable our people and our resources to mark time until the economic crisis could pass.

Having diligently tried out this experiment, there are many who feel that we need to return to the planting of abundant harvests, the foundation of real wealth—that no one could starve in a land of plenty. Indeed there are times when these necessities of life are far more valuable to the well-being of our people than gold, silver, or currency.

We have learned many useful lessons from the operations of relief measures such as the W. P. A., and among them, that we cannot continue indefinitely to appropriate billions to provide jobs. Some say we may have started something we cannot stop. We must now lend our efforts to find an effective substitute, the burdens of which could be shared by all according to their productive capacity.

Referring more directly to the effect the prevailing economic condition of the country may have had upon the youth in recent years, I am informed that over 50 percent of the crime in this country, of the more serious types—kidnaping, highway robbery, bank robbery, gangsterism—is being committed by minors, mere boys in their teens. Twenty-five years ago, only the seasoned barroom gambling thug of mature age would have committed such felonies as we have become so accustomed to seeing described in the daily papers.

There is a reason or cause back of this social cancer that is eating at the very heart of our people, and it will remain a pitiful commentary upon our civic ingenuity and pride if a solution is not found to alleviate it. We can and must find the cause and, if possible, apply the age-old ounce of prevention at the very source, rather than that pound of cure usually administered by the courts after the jail doors are closed.

We are told that in recent years it has cost city, county, State, and National Governments several billion dollars annually to run down, convict, incarcerate, guard, feed, and take care of these boys who have thumbed their way down the broad road to crime.

When the crash came in 1929, there were millions of parents past middle age, with minor children, less than 10 years of age. Many are growing up through the adolescent age, without that guidance and protection traditionally and properly divided between parental control and the ever-dependable teachers of the common and private schools.

Many thousands of these boys of our older people became desperate when they realized that there was nothing at home to pay for their food, clothes, and schooling. They soon thumbed their way down the road by the tens of thousands. The records will show that many never returned. They went along until they became hungry. Long experience has shown that a human being will break in and steal rather than perish from hunger.

The first time the wayward boy was not detected. He went farther on the way and again became hungry, and again broke and entered. The third time he was caught, tried, and sentenced as a felon. He then took his place, at that most impressionable age, in prison among hardened criminals. From that hour he became an outcast and a liability to society.

The old heartbroken mother and father are still hunting for some way to earn enough to eke out an existence during their remaining days.

We do not know the gross amount that a sales or transaction tax, or gross income tax, or some other tax, would produce, nor what the average per month would be when divided among the eligible old people, but a 2-percent sales tax on purchases for an average family with an income of $2,500 annually is only $50. It is clear that the average annuity insurance, providing for retirement at 60, is costing many times that amount.

A reasonable and workable tax would permit the younger people to lay up for themselves an insurance policy, in the form of old-age security, that would allow them to retire on what may be termed a fixed annuity at the age of 60. There ought to be some kind of a dividend or annuity for the citizens of this country who have paid their taxes for 40 years and actually own a life interest in at least one share in the richest government on earth. The proposed plan is nothing more nor less than a gradual form of industrial or old-age insurance to which all would contribute during the 40 years people are usually able to provide for themselves.

There could be little danger of our citizens becoming Communists or Nazis or Fascists if every American citizen knew that he had a definite reserved annuity fund laid up for him with his Government to secure him against want after he is too old to provide for himself.

If we could thus retire several millions of our people over 60, there would be ample employment for the young men and women who now often find there is no demand or call for their services. I have thousands of letters from young men and women who are well qualified to fill responsible positions, but I can find places for only a portion of those who seek employment.

We are facing facts, not mere theories. The Gallup poll, on the outcome of the 1938 elections and on several important national questions, has become so accurate that it is now generally respected as a more or less reliable expression of the cross section of our citizens. The poll which appeared in the Sunday, February 26, 1939, issues of the daily press, shows very significant facts as to the public's views on old-age security or pensions.

Bearing in mind that we live in a democracy in which our citizens through our system may express their views, it has occurred to me to show the undoubted trend of public sentiment on this question.

On the direct question, Do you believe in Government old-age pensions? 94 percent voted "yes" and only 6 percent voted "no."

In the same poll this important question was asked: "Would you be willing to pay a sales tax or an income tax in order to provide these pensions?" Eighty-seven percent voted "yes" and 13 percent voted "no."

That is the answer of the people of the United States.

In closing his comment on this test Dr. Gallup made the very significant observation that—

1. The present Social Security Act falls short of providing what the public considers an adequate old-age-pension system at this time. Unless Congress and the various States take steps to remedy the situation a growth rather than a decline of glittering pension schemes can probably be expected.

2. Although few Americans completely accept the proposals of Dr. Townsend and other pension leaders, or would be willing to pay the taxes to make them effective, many voters say they are supporting these plans because they are "in the right direction."

Under the circumstances, and especially in view of the fact that this matter has been discussed from coast to coast and in every State, it is the thought of many that the people should have the opportunity to vote on it. The Congress can then work out in detail an act in line with the principles expressed in S. 3255 and S. 3270 to put it into operation.

IT IS A NATIONAL AND NOT A STATE OR LOCAL PROBLEM

Mr. President, this important social and economic problem was carefully and wisely analyzed in a recent decision of our United States Supreme Court in the case of Helvering v. Davis (301 U. S. 619), involving the constitutionality of title II of the Social Security Act, captioned "Federal old-age benefits." The necessity for better securing the aged and thus the welfare of the Nation as a whole is so ably presented in the body of the opinion in that case that I shall here give that portion having reference to old-age security.

This is an epoch-making decision. It lays a new foundation for at least one important social edifice upon which to build old-age security.

Judge Cardozo, speaking for our Supreme Court, said:

The purge of Nation-wide calamity that began in 1929 has taught us many lessons. Not the least is the solidarity of interests that may once have seemed to be divided. Unemployment spreads from State to State, the hinterland is now settled that in pioneer days gave an avenue of escape. Spreading from State to State, unemployment is an ill, not particular but general, which may be checked, if Congress so determines, by the resources of the Nation. But the ill is all one or at least not greatly different whether men are thrown out of work because there is no longer work to do or because the disabilities of age make them incapable of doing it. Rescue becomes necessary irrespective of the cause. The hope behind this statute is to save men and women from the rigors of the poorhouse as well as from the haunting fear that such a lot awaits them when journey's end is near.

Congress did not improvise a judgment when it found that the award of old-age benefits would be conducive to the general welfare. The President's Committee on Economic Security made an investigation and report, aided by a research staff of Government officers and employees, and by an advisory council and seven other advisory groups. Extensive hearings followed before the House Committee on Ways and Means and the Senate Committee on Finance. A great mass of evidence was brought together supporting the policy which finds expression in the act. Among the relevant facts are these: The number of persons in the United States 65 years of age or over is increasing proportionately as well as absolutely. What is even more important, the number of such persons unable to take care of themselves is growing at a threatening pace.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ANDREWS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator prefer to make a connected statement without interruption, or is he willing to entertain a few questions?

Mr. ANDREWS. I believe I prefer to make my full statement without interruption. I think I can then better answer questions. The questions which the Senator has in mind may be answered a little later in my address.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is making a very able and comprehensive speech. I wish more Senators were present to get the benefit of it.

Mr. ANDREWS. I continue reading from the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States. My opinion may not be worth much, but the opinion of the Supreme Court is, and it is based upon facts brought before it in an orderly way.

More and more our population is becoming urban and industrial instead of rural and agricultural. The evidence is impressive that among industrial workers the younger men and women are preferred over the older. In times of retrenchment the older are commonly the first to go, and even if retained their wages are likely to be lowered. The plight of men and women at so low an age as 40 is hard, almost hopeless, when they are driven to seek for reemployment. Statistics are in the brief. A few illustrations will be chosen from many there collected. In 1930, out of 224 American factories investigated, 71, or almost one-third, had fixed maximum hiring age limits; in 4 plants the limit was under 40; in 41 it was under 46; in the other 153 plants there were no fixed limits, but in practice few were hired if they were over 50 years of age. With the loss of savings inevitable in periods of idleness, the fate of workers over 65, when thrown out of work, is little less than desperate. A recent study of the Social Security Board informs us that "one-fifth of the aged in the United States were receiving old-age assistance, emergency relief, institutional care, employment under the works program, or some other form of aid from public or private funds; two-fifths to one-half were dependent on friends and relatives; one-eighth had some income from earnings; and possibly one-sixth had some savings or property. Approximately 3 out of 4 persons 65 or over were probably dependent wholly or partially on others for support."

The problem is plainly national in area and dimensions. Moreover, laws of the separate States cannot deal with it effectively. Congress, at least, had a basis for that belief. State and local governments are often lacking in the resources that are necessary to finance an adequate program of security for the aged. This is brought out with a wealth of illustration in recent studies of the problem. Apart from the failure of resources, States and local governments are at times reluctant to increase so heavily the burden of taxation to be borne by their residents for fear of placing themselves in a position of economic disadvantage as compared with neighbors or competitors. We have seen this in our study of the problem of unemployment compensation. A system of old-age pensions has special dangers of its own, if put in force in one State and rejected in another. The existence of such a system is a bait to the needy and dependent elsewhere—encouraging them to migrate and seek a haven of repose. Only a power that is national can serve the interests of all.

Mr. President, some of the authorities noted by our Supreme Court in their opinion were cited in footnotes and are rather illuminating. They bear out with emphasis the Court's conclusions. I will give five of them here, as follows:

First. The Senate committee estimated, when investigating the Social Security Act, that over one-half of the people in the United States over 65 years of age and there are at least 6,000,000 of them—probably 8,000,000—are dependent upon others for support—Senate Report No. 628, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, page 4. A similar estimate was made in the report to the President of the Committee on Economic Security, 1935, page 24.

Second. A report of the Pennsylvania Commission on Old Age Pensions made in 1919, page 108, after a study of 16,281 persons and interviews with more than 3,500 persons 65 years and over, showed two-fifths with no income but wages and one-fourth supported by children; 1.5 percent had savings and 11.8 percent had property.

Third. A report on old-age pensions by the Massachusetts Commission on Pensions—Senate Report No. 5, 1925, pages 41, 52—showed that in 1924 two-thirds of those above 65 had, alone or with a spouse, less than $5,000 of property and one-fourth had none. Two-thirds of those with less than $5,000 and income of less than $1,000 were dependent in whole or in part on others for support. It may be mentioned in this connection that the people of the New England States have been more frugal and more careful to provide for their older people perhaps than have the people of any other section of the United States.

Fourth. A report of the New York State commission made in 1930—Legislative Document No. 67, 1930, page 39—showed a condition of total dependency as to 58 percent of those 65 and over, and 62 percent of those 70 and over.

Fifth. The National Government has found in connection with grants to States for old-age assistance under another title of the Social Security Act, title I, that in February 1937, 38.8 percent of all persons over 65 in Colorado received public assistance; in Oklahoma the percentage was 44.1; and in Texas, 37.5. In 10 States out of 40 with plans approved by the Social Security Board, more than 25 percent of those over 65 could meet the residence requirements and qualify under a means test and were actually receiving public aid.

No one will undertake to say that old-age security has not become one of the outstanding questions before the American people, and justice demands that ample provision be made for the necessary support, health, and comfort of these elderly citizens, who are practically ostracized from all employment.

As clearly pointed out by our Supreme Court, social security for the aged is more a National than a State duty and obligation. It cannot be solved by the enactment of a multiplicity of conflicting State laws, with unequal burdens of taxation, always subject to constant changes. It can be adequately solved only by a uniform basic law, national in scope, which will insure to the aged citizens of each State permanent and equal security with those in every other State.

The consensus of opinion among the leading economists and social workers is that the unemployment status through which we are passing is largely due to a lack of purchasing power of the average citizen; in other words, to a lack of ability of the American consumers to buy. The lack of ability to buy is, of course, chiefly due to a lack of employment. It is further conceded that employment is largely affected by the fact that many are compelled to labor many years beyond the age when they can deliver a dollar's worth of service for a dollar's worth of pay. Up to this time the only plan that has received Nation-wide study and the approval of many millions of our people is the plan proposed and known as the general-welfare bill recently re-formed and introduced in the Seventy-sixth Congress by the Senator from California [Mr. DOWNEY] as S. 3255, customarily referred to as the Dr. Townsend plan.

In brief, this revised plan provides for the levying and collecting of a Federal tax of 2 percent upon the gross income of all companies and persons over and above $250 per month from whatever source derived, the revenue collected therefrom to be placed in a separate general-welfare account, to be equally distributed among qualified citizens over the age of 60, and upon the specific conditions that the same shall not be hoarded but expended within a given period.

Such a tax imposed by the Federal Government would be equal and uniform and would necessarily be based upon ability to earn, in that those with small incomes would naturally pay less than those who receive much.

The plan does not require that the Federal Government issue any interest-bearing bonds, borrow any money, make appropriations, increase the national debt, or assume any financial obligations in any way to meet the provisions of the act, except to collect and receive the amounts brought in by reason of the special tax, to be paid out to each individual qualifying to receive it. The amount each beneficiary could receive of the total tax so collected would be determined by dividing the total sum collected by the number of eligible persons. Of course, no one can tell at this time just what that amount for each recipient will be.

It is believed by many who have carefully studied the whole situation that the carrying out of some plan in line with the principles stated in S. 3255, will result in the employment of millions of able-bodied persons now idle, not only by increasing production but by withdrawing large numbers of elderly people from the field of productive activity, thus creating new opportunities for the younger people of our land who would take their elders' places.

The indications are very convincing that this would ultimately make W. P. A. relief appropriations for unemployment almost, if not totally, unnecessary. As pointed out heretofore, it would decrease dangerous idleness and afford youth an opportunity for employment. It would necessarily reduce crime, thus saving additional billions of dollars of tax money expended annually in the enforcement of law, court costs, and other costs which follow in the wake of crime, including the maintenance of numerous prisons, reformatories, and protective agencies. Idleness and hunger are the twin beds of crime and lawlessness. It would also mean a tremendous saving in losses to our private citizens due directly to crime. For example, in 170 cities of over 25,000 population in 1938, detailed figures show that the value of property stolen, either by robbery, burglary, larceny, or theft, was over $28,000,000.

Perhaps the greatest benefit ultimately and continuously to be derived from the plan of old-age security would be the fact that it would inspire a greater spirit of loyalty to our Government and our American institutions. No one, whether foreign born or native citizen, regardless of any organizations, political or otherwise, to which he may belong, would have any incentive to try to tear down institutions under a government such as ours, definitely providing him against the infirmities of declining years, when he is no longer able properly to provide the comforts of life. A citizen will not tear down the temple which shelters him.

It would likewise be an incentive to youth, including the young married man, to pay the tax, in order that his old mother and father might be properly taken care of when they shall have reached the evening of life. Everyone could face old age with an assurance that he would not be a burden upon his children or his grandchildren. It is significant here to state that crime has seldom been chargeable to the idleness of persons after the age of 60.

It is believed by many who have made a close study of the old-age plan that it will have a strong tendency to substitute an economy of plenty for an economy of scarcity. It would likewise effect tremendous savings in the cost of operating and maintaining numerous county, State, and municipal institutions now known as homes for old people, reform schools for indigent children, and other like institutions which are direct burdens upon local governmental taxing units.

It is claimed that more than half of the old people now maintained at the hospitals for the mentally defective are not there because of their being a menace or dangerous to society, but are there classified as persons afflicted with senile dementia, which is nothing more nor less than old age. The fact that these dear old people have had to be sent away from their loved ones to spend their last days behind high walls and barred gates, remains a sad commentary upon our boasted humanitarian civilization.

The people of the State of Florida, through its legislature, have adopted and presented a solemn memorial to this Congress which is now here on record, pointing out the facts which I have mentioned, and in which they declare that old-age assistance is a national question.

We are further alarmed when we consider that crime is now the largest economic problem of the United States, particularly with regard to the fabulous expenditures it involves. The annual cost of crime in this country is estimated to be $15,000,000,000; and it will readily be admitted that a $15,000,000,000 enterprise, even in these days and times, is large in every sense of the word. This predatory activity levies and collects a tax of nearly $120 annually for every man, woman, and child in our Nation. Out of every dollar of national income, 25 cents must be charged off to crime.

In order to present the problem in a still more realistic manner, may I say that this $15,000,000,000 annual cost of crime is 400 percent greater than the national annual cost of education, which is a little over $3,000,000,000. In other words, the onslaughts of these criminal armies are costing us 400 percent more than we are spending in the education of the juvenile members of our communities.

If we spent more upon constructive education, our crime bill would be less. It may be further noted that the cost of lawlessness is 25 percent more than our total annual tax bill of approximately $12,000,000,000.

We have youth in crime because we have failed to provide youth with proper upbringing and opportunities. Only in the rarest instances of diseased minds can we say that the first offender commits crimes out of sheer antisocial sentiments. Children merge into crime because of deep-laid faults in society, such as poverty, idleness, and because their elders too often neglect them for pleasure.

Today, as you know, 20 percent of our worst crimes are the work of persons who have not yet even reached the voting age. This means that one-fifth of all murders, thieveries, robberies, and the other malignant outrages against our people are committed by boys in their teens—youths who should be reaching the threshold of useful lives.

This 20 percent falls tragically short of the boasted ideals of American citizenship. It is not a pleasant picture. It is not a healthful outlook. It is a deplorable condition when a nation such as America must bow under the disgrace of a set of circumstances in which one-fifth of our most deadly outlaws, our murderers, our machine-gunning desperadoes are little beyond childhood. It is incumbent upon all of us, therefore, to recognize and admit the causes for such conditions, and, reaching beyond, to search for the means by which they may be remedied.

When we are confronted with the fact that the crime army of America includes more than 700,000 boys and girls of less than voting age who, at the very threshold of life, were cut off from worthy careers, then, indeed, the other side of the cost of crime is recognized as a ghastly one. But the human costs do not end even here.

What of the 700,000 mothers who risked their lives to bring these boys and girls into the world? What of the mothers and fathers with heads bowed down in sorrow, the lines of which cannot be effaced?

President Coolidge, in speaking on this subject, made a profound statement. He said:

> To my mind, the great strength of society lies in its recognition of the necessity of discipline.

If the truth of that statement could only be instilled into the mind of every parent in the United States, we would have less crime. Discipline seems to have been forgotten. Laxity of administration in the duties of parenthood threatens the foundations upon which the family is based. It is all very well to say that youth should have its fling, but statistics show that the way of youth is tending too swiftly toward the path of crime. The family circle, once sacred in every American home, has been too often transferred from the fireside to the tonneau of a "tin lizzie."

There is no reasonable explanation which the fathers and mothers of America can make for this outrageous situation. They are allowing the reins to slip from their hands; they have allowed their own personal pleasures to become uppermost; they have allowed the spirit of family discipline to become weakened, and thus youth has lingered along the roads of life which must lead, all too often, to disillusionment. Parents have become too engrossed in enjoying the fleshpots and pleasures of the age to give proper attention to their offspring.

Discipline must be reestablished in the American home before we can look for better conditions. The father who thinks too much about golf to care what his son is doing; the mother who is so eager for bridge that she pretends to believe that her daughter, in a parked car beside the roadway, is merely indulging in a bit of harmless pleasure, must either recast their ideas or ultimately realize that they are unable to govern their own children for whose existence and upbringing they are responsible.

The law of sex with all its temptations and weaknesses, will never change until the laws of nature change; the laws of nature, like those of the Medes and Persians, change not.

In considering the problem of old-age assistance, the primary questions are: (1) How should it be initiated? and (2) How can it be financed?

The United States in this regard has lagged far behind other civilized nations, but of late years there has come a growing recognition of this, not only as it relates to our aged, but to youth as an economic factor in our national life.

The attitude toward this matter has steadily veered from the single idea of old-age assistance as a pension, per se, to a recognition of the fact that it likewise involves an economic factor affecting the lives of middle-aged and young people, all of whom must grow old some time. So the problem has become not only one of establishing a living standard for superannuates, but because of the large number affected and the consequent cost, a solution of the problem must be devised in such manner as will harmonize it with other national economic measures.

In other words, the old-age assistance problem has definitely become a part of any program for national recovery and relief. It cannot be otherwise, for current sources of revenue are not sufficient to take care of our relief problem, and it is the consensus of opinion that we should not add to our present methods of taxation from which the people are crying for relief.

Industry is adding to the acuteness of the situation by its continuous methods of lowering the age limit for employees. This is part of the trend brought about by the recognition that employers' liability insurance discloses that a majority of claims paid are to those past the age of 40, and the employer refuses to take a chance on the efficiency of a worker where Nature's processes of mental reaction to danger stimuli are operating against the older worker.

Therefore the problem of old-age assistance will become more and more acute as time goes on. The importance of making our desire to solve this situation in favor of the old people an interrelated measure with all the rest of our economic planning becomes pressingly important. Population trends indicate that, in the passing of the years, an ever-increasing percentage of our people will come under the classification of superannuates, and any system of assistance for this growing class must be undertaken on a pay-as-you-go basis, or we shall, as a nation, become bankrupt.

The matter of financing this program out of the revenue derived from incomes over a certain amount is practical and worthy of consideration. Some special form of tax must therefore be devised.

But when we come to the matter of levying new forms of taxes, particularly for specific purposes, we run into certain limitations, or at least implications in the Constitution. Some have said that the Congress already has the power to levy specific taxes for old-age assistance. Perhaps it has, but there are those equally sincere who have their doubts about the matter.

Let us remove these doubts by amending the Constitution on this point. This will save litigation, time loss, and serve to hearten our people in the belief that the Congress is mindful of their problem. If the only result of this amendment would be to show to the people of our Nation, both old and young, that we know their trouble and are seeking to help them, the new hope that would kindle in their breasts would amply pay us.

We must never lose sight of the fact that this problem of old-age assistance will become more acute as time passes. Technological advances, the lowering of age limits in industry, and the changing percentage of old to young in our population, all tend to emphasize the importance of this type of legislation. We should not leave the welfare of these old people, of whom our loved ones are or will be a part, to the vagaries and uncertainties of succeeding Congresses.

In the face of factual data available to all of us daily we should not leave the lot of the old ones in our midst to become a football of future acts of the Congress. We can fix the assurance to old age in our basic law; if it is unjust, it will be repealed; have no fear of that. But our duty to the old is plain. Regardless of any legislation which may come to us, we may now do more to add to the hopeful security of yet unborn generations by passing this amendment than all the temporary legislation we might pass in a whole session.

It will be noted that this joint resolution calls for the submission of this amendment to State conventions for their approval, according to the Constitution. We have a vexing old-age and youth problem in our midst today. All over this land of ours there are millions of our people who have espoused the principles of the Townsend plan and other plans. This joint resolution refers the amendment back to the people themselves, from whom we all receive our authority to act. In our perplexity we can thus consult with those whose franchise directed us here to do their service.

This matter rises above all party considerations. It is too important to our people to resolve it by party considerations. It is an amendment whereby all our people can take this important step and solve it once and for all.

Several Senators have asked me about the constitutional need for an amendment giving Congress the power to levy taxes for old-age assistance.

Of course, the question of constitutional need is of the utmost importance and is one reason for this proposed legislation. There are two other needs for it. One is to enable the testing of public opinion on the question, and the other is having the power of Congress to levy taxes for old-age assistance written into our fundamental law.

In order to elucidate the question of constitutional need and to show that there is a grave doubt in the minds of well-qualified persons as to the power of Congress to levy taxes for a specific purpose, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and I contend that there still exists considerable doubt as to the validity of earmarking taxes for a specific purpose, and we submit authorities which I shall cite in a moment as a basis for our belief. Many informed people believe that such a tax is not a "true" tax, but, rather, an "exaction" or "appropriation of money from one group for the benefit of another," which is in violation of the due-process clause. They maintain that such taxes are not levies "for the support of the Government," but are being used to pay pensions to specific individuals.

This constitutional amendment—Senate Joint Resolution 145—has been introduced in order to resolve this grave doubt.

EVIDENCE THAT THIS IMPORTANT CONSTITUTIONAL PROBLEM REMAINS UNSETTLED

(1) There is no judicial decision which meets the particular problem embodied in Senate Joint Resolution 145 foursquare.

(2) Professor Corwin, in his book, the Twilight of the Supreme Court, page 176, wrote:

So long as Congress has the prudence to lay and collect taxes without specifying the purposes to which the proceeds from any particular tax are to be devoted, it may continue to appropriate the national funds without judicial let or hindrance.

(3) The Social Security Act of 1935: Experts who assisted in the drafting of this measure clearly indicate that the separation of the benefit provisions in title II from the taxing provisions was dictated by constitutional considerations.

(a) Prof. J. Douglas Brown in his article, the Development of the Old-Age Insurance Provisions of the Social Security Act in Law and Contemporary Problems, volume 3, page 193, wrote:

The development of a formula for Federal action within constitutional limitations was early recognized as the key to a sound solution to the problem. The proposal to separate the contribution and benefit features of one legislation into two separate measures based on the taxing and appropriation powers of the Federal Government, was advanced early in the deliberations of the staff and the technical board. The absence of any need for elaborate regulatory material in either measure gave basis for the hope that the courts would not question the exercise of these broad Federal powers if clear-cut separation were possible. The staff was bolstered in this hope by the approval of the plan by a number of outstanding students of constitutional law.

The drafting of two distinctly separate titles covering the tax and benefit features of the proposed system proved a difficult task. Since the contributions, now taxes, were necessarily converted into the general funds of the Treasury, some formula had to be developed for the reapportionment of an equivalent amount from general funds to an old-age reserve account. * * *

As a result of this necessary adjustment to the exigencies of constitutional law, the character of the scheme was fundamentally different from that first considered by the staff.

(b) Prof. Paul H. Douglas, in his book, Social Security in the United States, wrote regarding compulsory old-age insurance—page 157:

The taxes or contributions required to provide the necessary funds are levied under title VIII of the bill, while the scale of monthly annuities and benefits is specified under title II. Here, as in the unemployment-insurance features of the bill, the revenue portions are separated from the sections which appropriate money because of the belief that this will enable the act better to run the constitutional gamut.

Page 320:

Perhaps the weakest section of the Security Act from a constitutional standpoint is that which provides for mandatory old-age insurance. While title VIII, which levies taxes upon employers and employees, is formally distinct from title II, which prescribes the scale of benefits to those over the age of 65 and to the heirs of the deceased, there is in fact a close and immediate connection between them. The individual benefits to be paid are computed upon the basis of the contributions or taxes levied and upon nothing else. It will undoubtedly be charged that these titles of the act in effect, therefore, prescribe the specific purpose for which the tax is levied, and that they are consequently unconstitutional since they launch the Federal Government into the performance of functions not specifically delegated to it by the Constitution. There is certainly very real danger that such may indeed be the fate of this feature of the act.

(4) The 1939 amendments to the Social Security Act: That there is still doubt as to the constitutionality of earmarking tax proceeds for a special purpose is indicated by this latest old-age measure. The device of using funds in the General Treasury rather than unquestionably earmarked tax receipts is continued here.

(5) United States v. Butler (56 Sup. Ct. 312, 1936): As said by Mr. Justice Roberts in delivering the opinion of the Court in the A. A. A. decision with respect to processing taxes levied upon processors, the proceeds of which were to be paid to certain producers of agricultural products:

A tax, in the general understanding of the term, and as used in the Constitution, signifies an exaction for the Government. The word has never been thought to connote the expropriation of money for one group for the benefit of another.

(6) Mr. Justice Cardozo, speaking for the Court, in declaring the Social Security Act to be constitutional, neatly avoided the important question of earmarking. This is sufficient reason to cast doubt on the whole question. He said:

Third. Title II being valid, there is no occasion to inquire whether title VIII would have to fall if title II were set at naught.

The argument for the respondent is that the provisions of the two titles dovetail in such a way as to justify the conclusion that Congress would have been unwilling to pass one without the other. The argument for petitioners is that the tax moneys are not earmarked, and that Congress is at liberty to spend them as it will. The usual separability clause is embodied in the act, section 1103.

We find it unnecessary to make a choice between the arguments, and so leave the question open.

(7) Robert Jackson, then Assistant Attorney General, arguing the Government's case in Seward Machine Co. v. Davis (301 U. S. 548), which involved the unemployment compensation features of the Social Security Act (titles IX and III), gave careful consideration to this problem. In his oral argument, he said:

The relation of this tax to the appropriation is entirely unestablished, either by the act itself or by the facts in the case. In the first place, the appropriation under section 301, if it be construed as an appropriation, began before the tax was payable. The appropriation is not measured by the proceeds of the tax. The tax is not earmarked for this purpose. There is no equivalence between the amounts set aside by this section and the proceeds of the tax.

The authorities cited sustain the position I have taken, that it would require a constitutional amendment to authorize a special tax for old-age assistance and to require that the money collected be placed in a fund to be used for the one purpose exclusively. The taxes assessed and collected by the Federal Government at the present time are put into a common fund, and we draw on that as long as any remains, and when there is no more, we issue bonds. We have issued and outstanding nearly $40,000,000,000 of bonds at the present time.

The plan I have discussed contemplates that this financial problem shall be met by a specific tax, which all who come under its terms will be required to pay, the money to be placed in a special fund to be used for the one purpose only, somewhat like the reserve funds of the great life-insurance companies are used.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have enjoyed the comprehensive speech made by the able Senator from Florida in its relation to Senate Joint Resolution 145. I hope his remarks may have wide circulation. I believe this joint resolution has been on the Senate Calendar since July of last year.

Mr. ANDREWS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I know the desire of the Senator from Florida, and of the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], is for early consideration of the joint resolution, and I assure the Senator that I shall be glad to cooperate with him at any time to have it taken up for consideration and a final vote obtained.

Mr. ANDREWS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. I ask that the resolution be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be passed over.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) to amend the act of July 3, 1926, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Crow Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this joint resolution and the bills immediately following have heretofore been objected to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I have no objection to the measures being considered, but I wonder if the Senator's attention has been called to the situation existing today.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a bill was passed under the terms of which a special committee was appointed, of which the chairman is the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. The committee has conducted hearings, and I hope the report will be submitted in the near future. I ask that the joint resolution and the bills, beginning with Calendar No. 83 down to and including Calendar No. 116, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The seven bills and the joint resolution, beginning with Calendar No. 83, Senate Joint Resolution 45, down to and including Calendar No. 116, Senate bill 498, will be passed over.

The joint resolution and bills passed over are as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 45, to amend the act of July 3, 1926, entitled "An act conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and render judgment in claims which the Crow Tribe of Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes."

S. 783, to amend the act, as amended, entitled "An act to refer the claims of the Delaware Indians to the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States," approved February 7, 1925.

S. 790, conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear and determine the claims of the Prairie Band or Tribe of Pottawatomie Indians of Kansas and Wisconsin against the United States.

S. 1222, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Osage Tribe of Indians on account of lands sold by the United States.

S. 767, conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, examine, adjudicate, and enter judgment in any claims which the Assiniboine Indians may have against the United States, and for other purposes.

The bill (S. 1681) to amend section 107 of the Judicial Code to create a mountain district in the State of Tennessee, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McNARY. I ask that the bill be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. As to that bill, which was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary some time ago, certain questions have been raised, for which reason I think it ought to be returned to the committee. I desire to ask that it be recommitted to the committee with the understanding, if I may have it, with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], who is also interested in the measure, that we may have an early hearing on the measure before the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. So far as I am concerned, Mr. President, I am ready to do what I can toward that end.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate bill 1681, Calendar No. 227, will be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 498, Calendar No. 116, which has previously been passed over, and which was introduced by me and favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 570) to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in agricultural products; to prevent unfair competition; to provide for the orderly marketing of such products, to promote the general welfare by assuring an abundant and permanent supply of such products by securing to the producers a minimum price of not less than cost of production, and for other purposes, was anounced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over! Over!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I make a point of order against the suggestion of the absence of a quorum. I understand there is no precedent on this question. I make the point of order that the Senate has transacted no business.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Senate has disposed of a bill on the calendar.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The refusal to transact business is not the transaction of business.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I shall be glad to be heard on that question if the Chair has any doubts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri is recognized.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The refusal to take up a bill on the calendar is as much an adverse disposal of the measure for the present as would be taking up the bill and failing to pass it. It is as much the transaction of business as though the bill were taken up and passed. I submit that the uniform precedents of the Senate are to the effect that any action of the Senate—even the recognition of a Senator for a unanimous-consent request—amounts to the transaction of business, and justifies the point of order of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is ready to rule. The present occupant of the Chair is of the opinion that the Senate, by declaring its unwillingness to take action, has taken action; and therefore the point of no quorum made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is sustained. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Frazier	Lee	Schwartz
Andrews	George	Lodge	Schwellenbach

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. AUSTIN. I should like to ask the Chair what the parliamentary situation is, the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senate is now operating under a unanimous-consent rule, and, therefore, rule VIII of the Senate's order of business is temporarily suspended. The clerk will state the next number on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2203) to amend certain sections of the Social Security Act was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

PROHIBITION OF ADVERTISING OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES BY RADIO

The bill (S. 517) to amend the Communications Act of 1934 to prohibit the advertising of alcoholic beverages by radio was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. President, as I understand the ruling of the Chair, this bill cannot be voted upon at the present time by a voice or by a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that since the Senate is operating under the unanimous-consent rule, one objection is sufficient to require the bill to go over at this time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That being the situation, Mr. President, it is not the purpose of the junior Senator from Colorado to work any hardship whatever upon the Senate.

This bill has been upon the calendar since April 28 of last year. Last summer I served notice upon the Senate that early in January I should bring up the bill. I had an opportunity to bring up the bill in January, but I was told by my majority leader that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] wanted to be present when the bill should be considered. The Senator from Wisconsin was detained in California on important business connected with the affairs of the Senate; and, out of courtesy to him, I did not call up the bill in January.

I think this bill should come before the Senate and be disposed of in the regular way. I do not think the present obstructionist policy is at all in keeping with the dignity of the Senate; but that is not the point to be argued, and it is not for me to determine. So I will say to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] that today I shall not move to have this bill taken up by the Senate for disposal. At some future time I expect to make such a motion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I wish to express my appreciation of the Senator's attitude in this matter. Of course, he realizes that with the procedure which has been followed for the past few minutes we should not get through the call of the calendar today, so that he would not have an opportunity to make his motion today anyway.

I appreciate the Senator's attitude. I can confirm what he has said. This bill has been on the calendar ever since last April. The Senator from Colorado is its author, and the bill was reported by one of the standing committees of the Senate. Regardless of its merits, and regardless of whether or not it is wise for Congress to pick out a particular subject and say that it shall not be advertised over the radio, which is not a matter upon which I now wish to pass or to comment, I have taken the position with respect to this and other measures that a bill reported by a standing committee is entitled to be considered by the Senate; and I have never regarded it as a part of my duty as majority leader to say to any Senator that he could not or ought not to make an effort to get up a bill in which he was interested, or of which he was the author.

The Senator from Colorado did speak to me in January about this bill. I knew that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] was absent on official business; and the Senator from Colorado very readily agreed that it would be improper, or at least he did not desire, to take advantage of the absence of the Senator from Wisconsin to take up the bill. The Senator from Colorado has been very patient and considerate of every Senator in regard to this measure, and I appreciate his present attitude.

I think he is acting wisely, however, in stating to the Senate that he has no purpose to try to get the bill up today because it would interfere with other desirable legislation, and practicaly nothing would be accomplished. I thank the Senator from Colorado for his generous attitude in the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I thank the majority leader for what he has said. At some future time I shall move to bring the bill up, but such a motion will not be made by me today.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, if I may be indulged for just a moment, in view of what has been said I am very glad indeed to bear witness to what the Senator from Colorado and the majority leader have said. In my judgment, it would not have been possible to consider the bill today, because I do not believe we would have completed the calendar. It was certainly my intention to make the point of no quorum after action on every bill taken up for consideration.

As to what the Senator from Colorado has said about it not being in keeping with the dignity of the United States Senate for a Senator to exercise his constitutional right to make the point of no quorum, I merely refer him to the Constitution of the United States. I am willing to take the judgment of George Washington and the other founding fathers on that subject in preference to the opinion of the Senator from Colorado, much as I respect his judgment.

I merely desire also to serve notice that when the Senator from Colorado, in pursuance of his right, does attempt to get the measure before the Senate, in pursuance of my right as a United States Senator, I shall oppose it by every proper and honorable means.

In the meantime, I send forward an amendment which I intend to propose to the bill at the proper time, so that it may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received and printed, and will lie on the table. The clerk will call the next measure on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1730) to amend the civil-service law to permit certain employees of the legislative branch of the Government to be transferred to positions under the competitive classified civil service was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

RELIEF OF SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR VOLUNTEER OFFICERS AND SOLDIERS

The bill (H. R. 289) for the relief of officers and soldiers of the Volunteer Service of the United States, mustered into service for the War with Spain, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this bill passed the Senate upon two occasions, and upon each occasion was vetoed by the President of the United States. I feel it is a measure on which the Senate should express itself, and I shall have no objection later, when the time is not so restricted, if someone who favors the bill will move to take it up and have the President's veto considered, and then such consideration given to the bill as its merits require. But for the present I object to consideration, in view of the limited time at our disposal, and the fact that the bill has been twice vetoed. I think the Senate should have a chance to consider it in the light of the President's veto before taking final action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1650) to promote peace and the national defense through a more equal distribution of the burdens of war by drafting the use of money according to ability to lend to the Government, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 915) to provide for the more expeditious settlement of disputes with the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BUSINESS AND ECONOMIC RESEARCH

The bill (S. 1740) to promote business and economic research in the United States by establishing and maintaining in connection with State university schools of business administration, research stations to cooperate with the Department of Commerce, was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, if the Senator who objected will withhold his objection, I should like to make a brief explanation of the bill.

The Secretary of Commerce is authorized by the bill to establish business-research stations at State and Territorial universities and other institutions. Once established, such a station can be discontinued or transferred to another qualified institution after a hearing by the Secretary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, what appropriation is proposed?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall come to that. I am about to give a brief description of the bill.

These stations are to be under the direction of the college of business administration, or, if there is no such college, the department of the university in which business subjects are taught, which will cooperate with the Department of Commerce in conducting research in business.

The bill prescribes that, to enable the business-research stations to function in pursuance of its provisions, there is authorized to be appropriated, to be paid to each institution at which a business-research station is established under the bill, a sum not to exceed $20,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941; and, similarly, a maximum for each succeeding year as follows: $30,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1942, inclusive of the first $20,000; $40,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1943, inclusive of the first $20,000, and $40,000 for each fiscal year thereafter; provided, that no payment in excess of $20,000 shall be made to any such institution for any fiscal year unless such institution, or the State for such institution, makes available for the use of such institution for each fiscal year, out of funds not acquired under the bill, an amount equal to such excess; and provided further, that no payments made under the bill shall be used by any such institution for any purpose other than for business research, nor shall any such payments in excess of $20,000 annually be used to reduce the business-research budget otherwise provided at such institutions below the average of those for the 3 fiscal years immediately preceding the enactment of the bill.

To enable the Secretary of Commerce to carry out the terms of the bill, there is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year beginning with the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, a sum not to exceed 4 percent of the total appropriation made for such year under the bill, or $50,000, whichever is the larger amount.

Mr. President, small-business men number about 4,000,000, and provide employment for approximately 15,000,000 people. They have been handicapped by a lack of facilities for research essential to their efficient operation, and, in fact, their very existence. Business-research stations, set up with the aid of Federal funds in those States where there is a real interest in such work, will be able to collect, study, and make recommendations concerning problems of the small-business man who is unable to give any time or money to such efforts himself.

Working through State and local trade associations and trade papers, as well as directly through their own reports, these business stations will have under this measure facilities and support not now available.

To a considerable extent at the present time, schools of business administration on a collegiate level have directed their time and effort to the training of young men and young women who expect to go into some phase of local business life. This training has been based upon the experience of the teachers and their individual contact with business and business leaders in the State. If the bill is enacted into law, and funds are made available for the establishment of research stations, not only will more facts of a local and practical character be made available to these young men and women, but the State, through its business-research stations, will be able to serve those who are already in business and who need information which is not now available to them.

The businessmen of this Nation desire to operate their own affairs in such a way that their businesses will benefit customers as well as themselves. It is my opinion that this piece of proposed legislation will, in the long run, place small business, particularly, on a more stable basis, place competition on a higher level, produce more continuous employment, and give the ultimate consumer a greater variety of goods and services for every dollar of income.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say at this time. I give notice that I shall move to take the bill up at the close of the call of the calendar.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. HILL. I merely wish to say, as a member of the committee which sat with the Senator from Texas and heard the testimony on the bill, that I agree with what the Senator has said as to the importance of the measure. I know the Senator from Texas has been diligent in his efforts to get the bill before the Senate, and I certainly hope he will have an early opportunity when he can move to take it up, and give the Senate an opportunity to consider and pass upon it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. SHEPPARD subsequently said: Mr. President, since I gave notice that I would endeavor to call up Senate bill 1740, I have looked further into the situation and do not feel I can make much headway by endeavoring to call it up this afternoon. I shall therefore postpone my effort until a later day and more favorable opportunity.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the following bills of the Senate:

S. 1850. An act to aid the States and Territories in making provisions for the retirement of employees of the land-grant colleges;

S. 2867. An act to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to transfer by quitclaim deed to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. for right-of-way purposes a small strip of land at Veterans' Administration facility, Coatesville, Pa.;

S. 2868. An act to facilitate the procurement of aircraft for the national defense; and

REGULATION OF EQUIPMENT ON NAVIGABLE WATERS

The bill (S. 2259) to amend laws for preventing collisions of vessels, to regulate equipment of certain motorboats on the navigable waters of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, this bill came from the Committee on Commerce last June, and I have been objecting to its consideration on each call of the calendar. It deals with the operation of motorboats throughout the United States. Since June I have been in conference with the Department of Commerce with respect to a series of amendments, and I am happy to say we are now in complete agreement on amendments, and I think that by the time of the next call of the calendar I shall be able to present a complete agreement for the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the subject connected with this measure is before the special committee of which the Senator from Texas is chairman, and his committee has had 2 or 3 days' hearings, and will be ready to report on the joint resolution within a short time.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING subsequently said: Mr. President, with respect to Senate bill 1970, which was reached on the calendar a few moments ago, inadvertently objection was made. I thought it was an Indian bill. I have no objection to its consideration; but I understand from the Senator from Wisconsin that perhaps it should not be taken up under the unanimous-consent agreement, with the limited period available for consideration.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I appreciate the statement of the Senator from Utah; but this is an important measure, and will require considerable debate. I do not think it can be disposed of during consideration of bills on the calendar by unanimous consent.

PAYMENT OF COMPENSATION TO RECESS APPOINTEES

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2773), to authorize the payment of compensation to recess appointees in certain cases, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments on page 2, line 4, after the word "office", to insert "other than the nomination of a person appointed during the preceding recess of the Senate," and at the end of the bill to add a proviso, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1761 of the Revised Statutes be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 1761. No money shall be paid from the Treasury, as salary, to any person appointed during the recess of the Senate to fill a vacancy in any existing office, if the vacancy existed while the Senate was in session and was by law required to be filled by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, until such appointee has been confirmed by the Senate. The provisions of this section shall not apply (a) if the vacancy arose within 30 days prior to the termination of the session of the Senate; or (b) if, at the time of the termination of the session of the Senate, a nomination for such office, other than the nomination of a person appointed during the preceding recess of the Senate, was pending before the Senate for its advice and consent; or (c) if a nomination for such office was rejected by the Senate within 30 days prior to the termination of the session and a person other than the one whose nomination was rejected thereafter receives a recess commission: Provided, That a nomination to fill such vacancy under (a), (b), or (c) hereof, shall be submitted to the Senate not later than 40 days after the commencement of the next succeeding session of the Senate."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXEMPTION OF CERTAIN INDIANS FROM PROVISIONS OF ACT OF JUNE 18, 1934

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Utah, under misapprehension, objected to Senate bill 2103 when it was reached on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I misconceived the number.

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2103, Calendar No. 1094, which was previously passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2103) to repeal the act entitled "An act to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources; to extend to Indians the right to form business and other organizations; to establish a credit system for Indians; to grant certain rights of home rule to Indians; to provide for vocational education for Indians; and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1934, and the act of June 15, 1935, supplementary thereto, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 13 of the act entitled "An act to conserve and develop Indian lands and resources; to extend to Indians the right to form business and other organizations; to establish a credit system for Indians; to grant certain rights of home rule to Indians; to provide for vocational education for Indians; and for other purposes," approved June 18, 1934, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"None of the provisions of this act shall apply to (1) any Indian tribe on the Standing Rock Reservation located in the States of North and South Dakota; (2) the Pine Ridge Sioux Tribe of Indians of the State of South Dakota; (3) the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe of Indians of the State of South Dakota; (4) the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians of the Rosebud Agency of the State of South Dakota; (5) any Indian on any reservation or any Indian tribe or group, located in the State of Nevada; (6) the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians located in the State of North Carolina; (7) any Indian tribe, band, or group located in the State of California; (8) any Indian or Indian tribe on the Colorado River Indian Reservation of the State of Arizona; or (9) the Navajo Tribe located in the State of New Mexico."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to exempt certain Indians and Indian tribes from the provisions of the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), as amended."

KINGS CANYON NATIONAL PARK, CALIF.

The bill (H. R. 3794) to establish the King's Canyon National Park, Calif., to transfer thereto the lands now included in the General Grant National Park, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I desire to make a statement against this bill. Under the unanimous consent agreement I believe I will not have sufficient time to speak against the bill. I need more than 5 minutes.

Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. How much time in all do I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 5 minutes on the bill, and 5 minutes on any amendment to the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think 5 minutes will be sufficient time for me to express my opposition to the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Could not the Senator from Nevada by unanimous consent speak longer than 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without question, by unanimous consent, he could speak longer than that.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Nevada be permitted to make his statement on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, then I will not raise any objection to taking up the bill.

I think the introduction of this bill and the stage it has reached in the Senate is one of the most remarkable things I have known to happen in connection with any legislation, and I have known of a great many peculiar things since I have been here. The Legislature of the State of California, after long hearings were had on the proposed establishment of the Kings Canyon National Park, voted on the subject, and in the State senate the vote against the measure was unanimous, except for two votes. The lower house of the legislature voted against it by a 2 to 1 vote.

The Farm Bureau of California acted on this matter and opposed the creation of this park. Seventy-two organizations in the State of California opposed the creation of this park. There is no doubt in my mind that this proposed legislation so far is solely the result of the domination of one man, standing against the Legislature of California, against the chambers of commerce of California, against the farm bureau, against the conservation societies. I know there is no one here who longs to see the bill pass. All long to get it out of the way because it is embarrassing to have the measure pending.

Mr. President, today there are in California over 2,000,000 acres in national parks. There is the great Sequoia National Park on one side of this proposed Kings Canyon National Park, and then there is the Yosemite National Park on the other side of it. Yet, in spite of that, it is proposed now to add 600,000 acres more lying between these two great national parks.

Nearly all the summits of the Sierra Nevada Mountains of California are today in national parks. Let it be understood that I believe in those watersheds being conserved. I believe also in having the timber conserved. But the 600,000 acres which are now proposed to be put in a national park are already, and have for many years been, under the control of the Forest Service. So far as I have observed, the Forest Service is as great a conservation organization as we have in the Government. It has done more to preserve the forests on the watersheds than has any other agency. It has done more toward scientific reforestation than the Park Service could possibly do, because the Park Service does not contain a scientific organization capable of handling the problem.

We have today 19,000,000 acres in national parks in the United States. Their area has been increased by over 1,000,000 acres in the past year, and there is a plan laid out for the future whereby the national parks will be increased to a far greater extent.

I feel, however, that the legislature of a State should have some voice in deciding whether or not the land in that State should be withdrawn from use. It is getting so that now in the Western States there is not enough land which may go into private ownership to raise sufficient taxes to support a State. Eighty-seven percent of the land in the State of Nevada is Government owned and controlled. Yet additional land is constantly being withdrawn from private acquisition.

In the southern part of my State 2,400 square miles have been taken and made into what is called a recreation area under the Park Service. They are now asking for appropriations to carry out that recreation scheme. In Nevada only about a year ago an area 52 miles square, taking in a whole mountain range, was withdrawn for park purposes. That is the only range in that section on which a farmer can graze his cattle. That is now being withdrawn from use or acquisition. The Government has taken it all.

The number of acres set aside for the Indians in my State is being increased. The Government has gone with cash money and bought up miles and miles of private ranches and turned them over to the Indians. That land is taken out of taxation.

Outside the forests of my State, all the land is today placed under the Taylor Grazing Act. That land is not subject to homesteading. It is not subject to acquisition under any law whatever except the mining law. It is out of use; it is out of private possession, out of taxation forever.

I see the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] sitting here. I am satisfied that three-fourths of the State of Arizona has been subjected to every character of withdrawal, so that today it is not subject to taxation at all.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Nevada is quite correct; that is to say, nearly two-thirds of the area of Arizona is withdrawn from the people and therefore, of course, withdrawn from taxation. If additional withdrawals are to take place in Arizona, it may become impossible to maintain the county governments, and it might become extremely difficult to maintain a State government. I cite for example two counties in Arizona. The Federal Government now controls 88.9 percent of the total acreage of Coconino County and 89 percent of the total acreage of Navajo County.

I know nothing of the pending bill, and I ask, Are we to understand that the Legislature of the State of California is opposed to the withdrawal?

Mr. PITTMAN. Absolutely; by an almost unanimous vote in the State senate, with the exception of two votes, and by a vote of 2 to 1 in the house, after long hearings.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator further indulge me?

Mr. PITTMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. ASHURST. It has long been my policy—from which I have never deviated—not to vote for the creation of any reserve or the withdrawal of any land from the people unless and until the board of supervisors of the county in which the land is located and the eligible State land board or the legislature of the State petitioned Congress to make the withdrawal.

Some 2 years ago I was requested to assist in securing the creation of what was to be known as the Petrified Forest National Park in Arizona; but I refused to support the bill unless and until the Arizona State Land Board and the supervisors of the counties in which the land lies urged the creation of the park.

Will the Senator further yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, power is the headiest wine known to the human race. We may explore the pages of history, but it is difficult to find in the annals of the human race any man in any nation at any time who, clothed with all power, did other than exercise that power oppressively. I know of no instance of an official of this Government or any other government who, being given absolute and arbitrary power, used it wisely.

In the West such reserves have been created, frequently by the ipse dixit of a department head or a bureau chief, and frequently by pressure from local civic authorities, who were told, "If you will have this or that half-million acres created into a park or other reserve, we will obtain for you $1,000,000 a year from Uncle Sam's Treasury to maintain the withdrawal."

This decade is not a resisting one when it comes to taking money out of the Public Treasury. I commend the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] because he has—with success on many occasions—tried to see to it that such vast tracts of land shall be reserved to the people when they are not needed for public purposes.

Under the law of 1906 the President is authorized to create national monuments. It was expected that there might be a rock, a tree, some freak of nature, some pinnacle of marvelous beauty embracing a few acres or a square mile, which might under that law be set aside as a national monument. But, Mr. President, under the heady wine of power, not only this administration, but preceding ones as well, have set apart and withdrawn hundreds of square miles as national monuments. Happily enough—I do not know when or how—Congress at some lucid moment reserved to itself the right to create a national park, and Congress has never given to any department head or bureau chief the power to create a national park. That is a happy circumstance. For once Congress retained the reins of power. National monuments, however, may be created by Executive power and thus a thousand square miles, forsooth, may be withdrawn from the people for one national monument by a stroke of the pen.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me the Senator from Arizona is somewhat lacking in information as to the situation. This is not a transfer from private ownership to public ownership. It is a transfer from a forest reserve already established over to the national park. Less than 1 percent of the land involved is in private ownership. Both Senators from California have indicated that they favor the creation of the park.

Mr. ASHURST. I have not read the pending bill and know nothing of it except what I have just learned from the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. I am speaking generally of the habit of departments in creating such reserves. However, if the pending bill proposes to withdraw lands from the State of California, and the Legislature of California is opposed to the bill, I would not support it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the land involved is forest land. It has been in a forest reserve for many, many years. It lies between the Yosemite National Park and the Sequoia National Park. It has been the best recreation site in California. So far as I know, it has been the best recreation site in the United States, and yet that recreation was had with conservation. A man could take his family and a tent and motor up to any little lake or stream in that forest and camp and fish. He would not be permitted to do that in a national park.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not criticize such regulations. The national parks were intended to preserve certain phenomena of nature, such as the geysers which spout at regular intervals in Yellowstone National Park. It is conceivable that they might be injured or destroyed. That is absolute conservation.

One may not camp in Yellowstone National Park. He must go to one of the miserable concessionaires and live with him. He may not fish in a national park without employing a concessionaire to take him out in a boat. If he desires to get on a horse and ride up to the high streams to camp and fish, he is not permitted to do so. I think that is all probably very proper.

However, when we are speaking of recreation and of opportunities for the people to get out into the wilds, there is no comparison between the forest reserves and the park system. The forest reserves have been preserved as wild areas, where any American citizen may go in his automobile with his tent and fish, or even hunt, or live. That may not be done in a national park.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SCHWARTZ. Under proper regulations he may also graze his livestock on the national forests, but he may not do so in a national park.

Mr. PITTMAN. The difference between a national park and a forest reserve is that a national park is conserved without use, except for the tourists to look at, whereas the national forests are preserved under conservation for the purpose of conserving the forests by reforestation and fire prevention, allowing the largest possible use by our people consistent with conservation.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I may be a little thin-skinned or sensitive on this subject. I hope not; but I have had some distressing experiences.

More than 20 years ago it occurred to me that the Grand Canyon in Arizona ought to be a national park. I need not now enter upon any eulogy of the gorgeous majesty of the Grand Canyon. Many artists in words have dipped their pen into the ink of temerity with a view of depicting the colors of the Grand Canyon. I make no attempt to do so, further than to say that I did believe that the Grand Canyon should be a national park. I sought the counsel and aid of an eminent lawyer who subsequently went to the Supreme Court of the United States and there served with great distinction. We drew a bill to create such national park, and the bill had the approval of the State of Arizona. We provided in the bill that although the lands might become a national park, all persons who had established or acquired homestead rights, mining rights, or any other rights in the proposed park should not be disturbed, but should enjoy such rights and be protected therein.

Under the bill creating the Grand Canyon National Park, all claims, locations, and entries, of whatsoever nature, which were at that time valid and subsisting were not to be disturbed. Some of the paragraphs of that bill, which became the law and is now the law, are as follows:

SEC. 4. That nothing herein contained shall affect any valid existing claim, location, or entry under the land laws of the United States, whether for homestead, mineral, right-of-way, or any other purpose whatsoever, or shall affect the rights of any such claimant, locator, or entryman to the full use and enjoyment of his land and nothing herein contained shall affect, diminish, or impair the right and authority of the county of Coconino, in the State of Arizona, to levy and collect tolls for the passage of livestock over and upon the Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to negotiate with the said county of Coconino for the purchase of said Bright Angel Toll Road and Trail and all rights therein, and report to Congress at as early a date as possible the terms upon which the property can be procured.

SEC. 5. That whenever consistent with the primary purposes of said park the act of February 15, 1901, applicable to the locations of rights-of-way in certain national parks and the national forests for irrigation and other purposes, and subsequent acts shall be and remain applicable to the lands included within the park. The Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion and upon such conditions as he may deem proper, grant easements or rights-of-way for railroads upon or across the park.

SEC. 6. That whenever consistent with the primary purposes of said park, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, under general regulations to be prescribed by him, to permit the prospecting, development, and utilization of the mineral resources of said park upon such terms and for specified periods, or otherwise, as he may deem to be for the best interests of the United States.

SEC. 7. That, whenever consistent with the primary purposes of said park, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to permit the utilization of areas therein which may be necessary for the development and maintenance of a Government reclamation project.

SEC. 8. That where privately owned lands within the said park lie within 300 feet of the rim of the Grand Canyon no building, tent, fence, or other structure shall be erected on the park lands lying between said privately owned lands and the rim.

Notwithstanding this law, the Interior Department has recently instituted a suit, under the power of eminent domain, to try to condemn some of the lands in private ownership in the Grand Canyon National Park. This lawsuit has aroused the resentment, the just resentment, of many persons in northern Arizona.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I understand an effort was made a short time ago to set aside as a national monument an area in my State larger than the State of Rhode Island.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KING. I have interposed objection to it. I do not know what the result may be. I think a measure should be enacted to prevent lands in the public domain being set apart for monuments, parks, or reserves without an act of Congress.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think I thoroughly agree with what the Senator has said. I have announced two or three times that I intended to introduce a bill of that kind. One would not think it was necessary, however, to introduce such a bill.

Mr. KING. I would not.

Mr. PITTMAN. One would have an idea that Senators representing States here would have some respect for other States and that they would give adequate consideration to some of their interests. It is very difficult, of course, for a Senator coming from a State where all the land is held in private ownership, and has been probably from the beginning of our Government, to understand the situation in the section where the public lands are located.

I repeat that with 87 percent of the area of my State public land, the support of State and local governments becomes a serious matter. There have already been withdrawn large areas for forest reserves, large areas for Indian reservations; there were taken 2,400 square miles for a recreation area in the southern part of the State; and, going a little farther north, there was taken a tract of land 52 miles square—think of that—as large, probably, as the State of Rhode Island. With a pencil it was marked on the map as a reserve for mountain sheep. Yet that high mountain land in the southern part of the State, where it is hot and dry, is the only range land available to small farmers living around that mountain. But it is reserved forever now by the great Department of the Interior. Right across the valley from this 52 miles square is a forest reserve that has been there for years, covering almost a great mountain range. That is a game reserve which will take care of all the mountain sheep and all the other game that may be found in southern Nevada.

I say Senators do not understand the situation, and, therefore, we of the West should have some expression with regard to what should be done with the lands in our States.

Let me read a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California. It is very brief and was adopted unanimously, I believe, except for two votes in the California Senate. The resolution is as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 2

Relative to the memorialization of the President and the Congress of the United States for the protection, use, and development of the natural resources of the State of California

Whereas nature has bestowed upon the State of California a priceless heritage of natural resources of soil, water, forests, minerals, forage, game animals, birds, fish, and scenic and recreational attractions; and

Whereas these natural resources are vital to the permanence and future growth and prosperity of the basic industries of the State, and to the welfare and happiness of its citizens; and

Whereas the protection and wise use of our valuable natural resources is the responsibility of the Federal and State Governments, and the civic duty of all our people; and

Whereas large areas of California's important watersheds, forests, grazing and mineral lands, fishing streams and lakes, wildlife ranges, free public playgrounds, and scenic features are found within the national forests in the State; and

Whereas there is pending national legislation which will create a new national park in the Middle and South Fork of Kings River that will remove large water and other natural resources from development and use by adjacent dependent communities; and

Whereas these national-forest resources are protected and managed for the benefit of all our citizens and the permanence of our industries and are open at all times to full utilization and economic development: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the State of California, through its legislature, hereby memorializes and petitions the President and the Congress of the United States that all national-forest lands in the Middle and South Fork of Kings River and their valuable natural resources be permanently retained in national-forest status under the protection and administration of the Forest Service, United States Department of Agriculture, where they will be perpetually open, as needed, to all measures, developments, and activities necessary for the full use, regulation, and control of the land and the resources thereof; and be it further

Provided, That this resolution is not to be construed as any criticism of the National Park Service or as evidence of any lack of appreciation of the aid given this State by the Federal Government in respect to flood control and the construction of irrigation dams; and be it further

Provided, That this petition is not to be interpreted as manifesting a lack of sympathy on the part of this legislature with the basic objective of the Federal Government to provide for the perpetual protection of national-forest lands in the Middle and South Fork of Kings River as a protected wilderness for the benefit and enjoyment of future generations; and be it further

Resolved, That the State of California, through its legislature, hereby memorializes and petitions the President and the Congress of the United States that any contemplated further extension to Yosemite National Park be deferred until some plan is evolved to compensate adequately the counties for the resulting loss of tax revenue; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate is hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and to Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives and to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Chief of the Forest Service.

I think that explains the situation as clearly as anything could.

In addition to that there is the resolution adopted by the Farm Bureau Federation of California, which I ask leave to have printed at this point in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution referred to is as follows:

"Whereas for a number of years the Department of the Interior has had an announced policy calling for the creation of a new national park in California to be known as the Kings River Canyon National Park; and

"Whereas this proposed national park embraces some 600,000 acres of territory in this State, having within its boundaries resources of high economic value to the future development of the State; and

"Whereas the territory in question is now under the administration of the United States Forest Service, whose management and multiple use policy guarantees the availability of these resources for future economic development of the State, as well as full recreational use; and

"Whereas many of the important economic resources in question would be locked up and future development prohibited under national-park policy and administration; and

"Whereas the United States Forest Service has submitted a development plan for the area, which is highly commendable, which guarantees proper recreational development and scenic safeguard; and

"Whereas we are informed that a general expansion program of national parks in California is contemplated by the Department of the Interior; and

"Whereas there are now within this State 2,905,269 acres of national parks and national monuments yielding no revenue to the State, many of these units (notably Lassen Volcanic National Park) being underfinanced and underdeveloped for public use; and

"Whereas it is the belief of this body that the interests of the State can best be served if Kings River Canyon area remain under the management of the United States Forest Service; and

"Whereas it is the belief of the Fresno County Farm Bureau that 'within the forested regions of California, the extension of present boundaries of national parks, or the establishment of new national parks should be made only when such extension or establishment shall be for the best national interests and in accordance with the best social and economic development of the State in its broadest aspects': Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That this body earnestly request the board of directors of the California Farm Bureau Federation to oppose the creation of the proposed Kings River National Park."

Motion to adopt by California Farm Bureau Federation carried, May 18, 1938.

We understand that the Army engineers and the Reclamation Service have completed reports concerning the possibility of building the Pine Flat Dam.

May we recommend that copies of each of these reports be made available to interested and affected groups, and that no action be taken looking to the construction of the Pine Flat Dam until water users in the area have had full opportunity to study the reports and express their opinions.

Respectfully submitted.

CALIFORNIA FARM BUREAU FEDERATION,
By ALEX. JOHNSON.

Mr. PITTMAN. Seventy-two other organizations have appeared and their resolutions are in the hearings.

Mr. President, I realize that this is a futile attempt on my part so far as this bill is concerned, but the question is of too great importance to allow it to drift on without protest. It looks as though everybody is ashamed to look at or to mention this bill. I even have dear friends who are anxious that it go through in a hurry so that they may forget it, urge me to let it pass, and I want to help them all I can.

I wish to say again that the legislature of my own State of Nevada supported the resolution of the legislature of the State of California and have petitioned their Representatives in Congress to oppose this bill, and I am opposing it, hopelessly I know.

Mr. KING. Why?

Mr. PITTMAN. I cannot say why. I stated why once in the Burlew hearings, and my reason now is the same.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, just a word or two. This bill received extensive hearings in the Public Lands Committee of the other House. It was passed there with certain amendments. It came before the Public Lands Committee of the Senate. A subcommittee was appointed which held extensive hearings. The report of the subcommittee approving the passage of the bill appears in the report on the bill, and I think, in order to save time, I will ask that the report of the subcommittee be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

JULY 28, 1939.

Hon. ALVA B. ADAMS,
Chairman, Committee on Public Lands and Surveys,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: The subcommittee appointed by the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys to study an act (H. R. 3794) to establish the Kings Canyon National Park, Calif., to transfer thereto the lands now included in the General Grant National Park, and for other purposes, having considered the same, report favorably thereon with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

The purpose of the act, H. R. 3794, is to conserve permanently in its natural condition, as a national park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people, one of the most famous scenic areas in the United States. The bill would abolish the General Grant National Park and would add it, to be known as the General Grant Grove Section, to the new national park, which would be known as the Kings Canyon National Park. All of the public lands to comprise the new park, with exception of the General Grant National Park, would be transferred from the Sierra and Sequoia National Forests. The total area of the proposed park is 454,600 acres, of which 5,763 acres are privately owned. The major portion of the privately owned lands comprise the Redwood Mountain Grove of giant sequoias, the finest large grove remaining in private ownership, which the bill would authorize for addition to the park. This proposed legislation has been approved by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Interior.

Timber, mineral, and grazing resources of the Kings Canyon wilderness are negligible. The average annual number of livestock grazing within the proposed park during the last 5 years is only 985 cattle and horses and 300 sheep, allotted to 12 permittees. The act protects these privileges and provides for the continuation of these permits during the lives of the present permittees. The Commissioner of the United States Bureau of Reclamation and the Chief of Army Engineers have both issued written statements giving assurance that the most feasible water-storage and power-development sites along the Kings River are outside of the proposed park and that they have no plans for developments within the proposed park area.

The Chief Forester of the United States Forest Service, now administering these public lands, has testified that their primary value is for recreation and that they are of national-park caliber. The State of California, at a cost of millions of dollars, has built a highway into the canyon of the South Fork of Kings River, converting what has been an inaccessible wilderness into a resort for tens of thousands of visitors. It is urgent that Congress establish a permanent policy for administration of this region before the new highway is opened to traffic this summer.

The creation of the park is supported by almost every newspaper of California, by almost every organization and group that has considered it, and by almost all the voters.

Very truly yours,

PAT MCCARRAN, Chairman.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, the bill has the approval both of the Interior Department and of the Department of Agriculture. The subcommittee report points out one thing which should be of interest to the Senate. It gives the total area involved and then states:

Timber, mineral, and grazing resources of the Kings Canyon wilderness are negligible. The average annual number of livestock grazing within the proposed park during the last 5 years is only 985 cattle and horses and 300 sheep, allotted to 12 permittees. The act protects these privileges and provides for the continuation of these permits during the lives of the present permittees.

I have a very general accord with the purposes and views of the Senator from Nevada, but I think the particular bill, if passed, would tend to preserve for public recreational purposes, under the administration of the park authorities, one of the finest scenic areas of the country. The passage of the bill would not jeopardize power development; it would not involve the taking away of grazing or other privileges.

I am relying, as did the committee in reporting the bill favorably, upon the report of the subcommittee and upon the favorable recommendations of both the Interior Department and the Forestry Service, supplemented by the favorable attitude of the two Senators from the State of California, whose judgment would largely conclude my opinion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what would happen to this land or what would happen to its scenic value if this bill were not passed?

Mr. ADAMS. The scenic features of it are in the forest reserve, and nothing would happen to them except that they would not be available in the same way that they would be available under the administration of the Park Service. In other words, the Park Service develops scenic resources; the Forestry Service does not make the same character of development.

Mr. LODGE. Is this land at the present time in danger of being despoiled or wasted or damaged?

Mr. ADAMS. I think not. It is under the forest administration. The tract is large, embracing, as I recall, 454,000 acres, and including 5,763 acres which are privately owned and which contain an extensive growth of giant sequoias. Those trees may be cut and destroyed if something is not done. That, in acreage, is a minor part. In scenic value, it is a major part.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the tract of land in the State of California particularly described as follows, to wit: Beginning at the summit of Junction Peak, being a point on the present north boundary of Sequoia National Park, also a point on the Tulare and Inyo County line; thence westerly along said north boundary of said park to the crest of the hydrographic divide between Boulder Creek and Sugarloaf Creek; thence in a northerly direction along the crest of the hydrographic divide between Boulder Creek and Sugarloaf Creek to the intersection of said divide with the section line between sections 3 and 4 of township 14 south, range 30 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; thence northerly along the section line between said sections 3 and 4 and between sections 33 and 34, and sections 27 and 28 of township 13 south, range 30 east, to the northwest corner of southwest quarter of section 27; thence northwesterly along the ridge immediately adjacent to and lying northeast from the headwaters of the east fork of Lightning Creek to the intersection of said ridge with the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 13 south, range 30 east, which point lies on the said section line three-quarters of a mile more or less westerly from the northeast corner of said section 28; thence in a northerly direction across the easterly branch of the east fork of Lightning Creek at Summit Meadow to the ridge north of said creek branch; thence northeasterly along said ridge to Lookout Peak; thence in a northeasterly direction along the ridge from said peak, being also the crest of the hydrographic divide between Sheep Creek and Lightning Creek to the intersection of said ridge with the line between sections 15 and 22, township 13 south, range 30 east, which point lies one-quarter of a mile more or less westerly of the northeast corner of said section 22; thence easterly along said section line to the corner of sections 14, 15, 22, and 23; thence north along the line between sections 14 and 15 to the southwest corner of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 14; thence east to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of the said section; thence south to the southwest corner of the northeast quarter of the said section; thence east to the southeast corner of the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of the said section; thence south to the southwest corner of the northeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the said section; thence east to the northeast corner of the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of the said section; thence south to the southwest corner of section 13; thence east on the line between sections 13 and 24 to the southeast corner of section 13; thence south to southwest corner of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 19, township 13 south, range 31 east; thence east along the north latitudinal one-sixteenth section line of sections 19, 20, and 21 to the southeast corner of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of said section 21; thence north to the quarter section corner of sections 16 and 21; thence east along the line between sections 16 and 21 to the southeast corner of said section 16; thence north along the section line to the quarter section

CITIZENSHIP, ETC., OF CERTAIN PANAMA CANAL ZONE EMPLOYEES

The bill (S. 3130) relating to the citizenship and compensation of certain employees on military construction work in the Panama Canal Zone was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, I am going to ask that the bill go over; and if the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS], who reported the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, were present, I should move that the bill be recommitted.

This bill is properly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, which has considered that and similar subjects on a number of occasions. In my opinion, the bill was erroneously referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and erroneously reported from that committee.

I shall not make the motion to recommit the bill at this time, in view of the absence of the Senator from North Carolina, but it is my intention at the proper time to make such a motion.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senator from Missouri to Calendar No. 1234, House bill 7941.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. House bill 7941 is similar to the bill which the Senator from Missouri has asked to go over. Without objection, House bill 7941 will go over, as well as Senate bill 3130.

The PRESIDING OFFICER subsequently said: House bill 7941 has already gone over under a previous order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, that bill is not identical with Senate bill 3130. I was under a misapprehension if I asked that House bill 7941 go over, because it simply has to do with Army construction work on the Panama Canal. Therefore, I withdraw my objection and ask unanimous consent that the other bill be returned to Senate bill 3130, if that is an identical bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senate will consider the House bill, H. R. 7941.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. KING. Both bills should go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bills will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

Mr. KING. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

(g) Pensioners and destitute patients who die in naval hospitals: Provided, That only the expenses of preparation for burial and interment shall be allowed in disposing of the remains of such pensioners and destitute patients.

SEC. 4. The acceptance by the Secretary of the Navy of the transfer or quitclaim by the city of San Diego of any of the lands herein mentioned shall not be construed as a relinquishment by the United States of its claim of title or interest in said land in any manner arising.

JOHN L. HINES

The bill (S. 3038) to provide for the advancement of John L. Hines on the retired list of the Army was announced as next in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. May we have an explanation of the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the War Department recommends the passage of this bill. Its purpose is to provide for the advancement of Maj. Gen. John L. Hines, United States Army, retired, former Chief of Staff of the Army, to the grade of general on the retired list of the Army without the benefit of increased retired pay and allowances. General Hines is the only former Chief of Staff on the retired list who does not hold this rank. It is provided by a law enacted after he had served as Chief of the General Staff.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, one minute. I think we ought to have a better explanation than that. Is this just the entering wedge for giving to retired generals of the Army, later on, greater compensation than the regular compensation?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No retired pay is provided for.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that; but if we enact the measure——

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill provides that he shall not have the benefit of increased retired pay and allowances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a bill similar to this has passed the Senate at least two, and perhaps three, times. It also passed the House of Representatives two or three times, but never happened to pass both bodies during the same session.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

(b) The use of the said national poultry improvement plan emblem or the prefix "U. S." in describing, advertising, or selling any hatching eggs, chicks, poults, or poultry-breeding stock, without the unsuspended and unrevoked permission of the Secretary so to do; or the use of any word or combination of words, letter or combination of letters, or of any emblem, design, or device, or of any false, misleading, or deceitful means or practice, in describing, advertising, or selling any hatching eggs, chicks, poults, or poultry-breeding stock for the purpose of indicating that the user is participating in or complying with the provisions of the said national poultry improvement plan when he is not.

SEC. 6. Any person who shall violate any of the provisions of section 5 of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for the first offense, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not to exceed $200, and for each subsequent offense and conviction thereof shall be fined not less than $200 nor more than $500.

SEC. 7. After judgment of the court, notice shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by such regulations as the Secretary may deem proper.

SEC. 8. This act shall become effective upon the date of its passage: Provided, however, That those persons who, at that time, are participating in and complying with the provisions of any plan for the improvement of poultry, poultry products, flocks, and hatcheries within the United States, approved by the Secretary, may be allowed to use the terms provided in such plan until 6 months from the date of passage of this act, after which time they also shall be subject to the provisions of this act.

CHRISTINE LUND

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 815) for the relief of Christine Lund, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to strike out "$4,000" and insert "$2,646," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Christine Lund, of Lane County, Oreg., care of Slattery & Slattery, Eugene, Oreg., the sum of $2,646, in full satisfaction of her claim against the United States for personal injuries sustained by her when struck on December 16, 1937, at 1½ miles north of Florence, Oreg., by an automobile of the United States operated by H. T. Schinaman, an employee of the Lighthouse Service, then engaged in the performance of his duties as such employee.

ZOOK PALM NURSERIES, INC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 808) to confer jurisdiction upon the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida, to hear, determine, and render judgment upon the claim of Zook Palm Nurseries, Inc., a Florida corporation, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, this bill proposes to confer on the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of Florida the authority to try the question whether or not the claimants, the Zook Palm Nurseries, Inc., are entitled to damages against the United States.

The claim arose out of the construction of the Inland Waterway in central Florida, near Palm Beach, and the case is one in which the facts are rather seriously controverted. The amount of the claim is rather large. The Government concedes that damages amounting to some $85,000 probably resulted. Whether or not the Government should be held liable is a close question.

There were two serious questions in controversy, which caused me to suggest important amendments to the bill. The original bill conferred absolute jurisdiction upon the court to determine the question involved. I recommended an amendment, and the committee approved my recommendation, I being chairman of the subcommittee in charge of the bill, to provide that the district judge, not the court, but the district judge, without jury, should first determine whether or not there had been executed by the claimant a release, and, secondly, to determine before the trial whether or not there had been an agreement on the part of the Government to build a dike.

The bill now provides that if either of those questions is answered adversely to the claimant, proceedings shall then stop, but if the judge finds that there was no release and that there was an agreement on the part of the Government to build the dike contemplated by the parties when they made a certain settlement, the court shall then proceed and try the case with a jury.

I think there has been worked out a very fair arrangement from the standpoint both of the Government and the complainants in the case. I think the bill is one which should pass. There is no doubt that substantial damages were suffered, but whether or not the Government should be held responsible is a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Did not the Department report against the enactment of the bill?

Mr. BROWN. The Department's report is not entirely favorable or unfavorable. What impressed me was that the Department conceded that the parties had been damaged to the amount of $85,000. The claim for damages is somewhat larger than that; I think it is almost twice that amount, but the facts are in such controversy that I felt that there should be a determination of the facts. I was of the opinion, however, there should be first a determination by the court as to whether there had been a legal or valid release by the Zook Nursery to the Government.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me that the question whether or not there had been a valid release is one which the committee could determine, and certainly the able Senator from Michigan could determine it as well as any judge who sits in Florida. I do not wish to disparage the judicial authorities in Florida, but I would be satisfied with a determination of the question by the Senator from Michigan, and as he investigated the case, may I ask him if he cares to express an opinion as to whether there was a release?

Mr. BROWN. I may say that if one depended upon the writings alone, he would be unable to come to a sound determination. I would not be satisfied from the writings alone to make a determination of that question. My inclination would be to hold with the Government, but the facts as testified to by the president of the corporation were such that if his statement was true there was not a valid release.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator says it should be left to the judge to pass on the facts.

Mr. BROWN. No——

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that such a bill as this would be constitutional, taking into consideration the provision of our Constitution which distinctly provides that "where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 the right of trial by jury shall be preserved"?

Mr. BROWN. I think that the Congress can do anything it desires about a grant of authority to a court to make determination. I thought the determination of the facts was one which the court should make, under all the circumstances. I believe that a jury would readily determine against the Government on the facts which are presented, and I thought that the determination should be confined to a judge, and since we have the power to say that jurisdiction shall be conferred, I think we have the power to limit jurisdiction, and the bill so limits it. It is a mixed question of law and fact. I felt that upon that proposition we ought to leave the determination to the court alone. I think there is no doubt that we have the power to hedge about our consent in the manner in which it has been done in the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not sure that I understand the situation, but if I do, I do not see how the Congress can overrule the Constitution and turn over to a judge the right to pass on the facts of any lawsuit. There is a constitutional right to have a jury trial.

Mr. BROWN. We can refuse to grant jurisdiction altogether if we so desire. I believe that under such circumstances we can place in the court jurisdiction of the whole matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I suggest to the Senator that he let the bill go over to another call, so that I can look into it.

Mr. BROWN. I am glad to consent to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being heard, the bill will be passed over.

Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

MAJ. HERBERT A. JACOB

The bill (H. R. 1456) for the relief of Maj. Herbert A. Jacob was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSTRUCTION OF SMALL RESERVOIRS UNDER THE FEDERAL RECLAMATION LAWS

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may revert to Calendar No. 1244, Senate bill 3136, to authorize an appropriation for the construction of small reservoirs under the Federal reclamation laws. I was absent from the floor, in attendance upon the hearing of the Temporary National Economic Committee, when this bill was called, and I have since learned that an objection was made to consideration of the bill by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], who asked that it be permitted to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, what is the nature of the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] requests that the Senate revert to Calendar No. 1244, and consider Senate bill 3136, to authorize an appropriation for the construction of small reservoirs under the Federal reclamation laws.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I shall have no objection to any statement or explanation that the Senator from Wyoming wishes to make.

Mr. TAFT. I object on the ground that I do not believe a bill involving so large an authorization should be passed without time being allowed for debate.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withhold his objection at least until the author of the bill may make an explanation.

Mr. TAFT. Surely.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I understood the Senator from Arizona was going to ask a question.

Mr. HAYDEN. I say I have no objection to hearing an explanation from the Senator from Wyoming. After we have heard the explanation we can determine what to do.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, I merely desire to call attention to the fact that this bill authorizes appropriations up to $5,000,000 for the construction of small reservoirs, each reservoir to cost not more than $50,000 under the provisions of the reclamation law. That means under the provisions of a law which requires the repayment into the Federal Treasury by those who are benefited by the expenditures of the funds which will be expended. In other words, if a small reservoir is constructed, then the owners of the land which will be benefited by the storage of water in that reservoir will be required to repay the expenditures into the Federal Treasury.

The bill authorizes this fund to be taken either from the General Treasury or from the special fund known as the reclamation fund.

It appears to me that the Senator from Arizona will be particularly interested in the facts which I am about to relate, because he and I have cooperated in years past in the effort to build up the reclamation fund.

I will say to the Senator from Ohio that so far as the reclamation fund itself is concerned, the proposal does not in any sense whatsoever constitute a drain upon the taxpayers of the United States. The reclamation fund is built up by receipts from the sale of public lands and by receipts from oil royalties, among other sources. Oil royalties, which are derived from leases upon the public domain, have in recent years been the chief source of revenue for the reclamation fund. Those leases have been issued by the Department of the Interior under a royalty system which, in some cases, is upon a sliding scale and which returns to the Federal Treasury a fund which is subsequently divided between the Federal Government and the States.

The Senator from Arizona well remembers that when the General Leasing Act was passed, my predecessor, the late Senator Kendrick, was largely responsible for securing the amendment of that act in this particular, so that the States would obtain this revenue in lieu of the loss of revenue from taxation. Of the royalty fund, 10 percent goes to the Federal Treasury for general expenses, and 37½ percent goes to the States. The latter fund in turn is divided by State law between the counties and the schools. It is expended for the building of roads and highways. It is expended for the payment of salaries of school teachers and for the maintenance of schools, and in the State of Wyoming it is also expended for the support of the State university.

In addition to the 10 percent which goes to the Federal Government, and the 37½ percent which goes to the States, there is another proportion, namely, 52½ percent, which goes into the reclamation fund.

LANCE CREEK OIL ROYALTIES

The Senator from Arizona will be interested in the fact that beginning last October the Department of the Interior has initiated adverse proceedings against some 100 or more placer mining claims in the Lance Creek oil field in Wyoming. In this field, according to the allegations by the Department of the Interior, there are approximately 1,200 or 1,500 acres of land now being claimed by certain oil companies—the Ohio Oil Co. for one and the Continental Oil Co. for another—under placer locations, which claims the Department of the Interior alleges are invalid. According to the contest proceedings which have been begun, these placer locations, which originated more than 20 years ago, were abandoned and all rights under them had terminated, but later they were attempted to be revived when the value of the land became apparent.

On the 1,200 acres of which I spoke I am advised that something like 15 separate wells have been drilled, each well producing daily, or capable of producing daily, 1,000 barrels of oil. Obviously, 15 oil wells, each capable of producing 1,000 barrels of oil a day, would be a source of tremendous revenue to the reclamation fund and to the treasury of the State of Wyoming if the claims of the Department of the Interior are sustained. If the placer-law locations are maintained, the Federal Treasury, the reclamation fund, and the State will receive no royalty. But, on the other hand, if the adverse proceedings of the Department succeed, I think it is safe to say that this Lance Creek field in Wyoming alone will produce for the State of Wyoming at least $3,000,000, and for the reclamation fund, I am told, approximately $5,000,000, which is the authorization for future appropriations provided in this bill.

These adverse proceedings of which I spoke were initiated between October of last year and January of this year, and I am advised that the Interior Department is very confident of the strength of the case which it has brought. And if it should succeed there would be this great accretion to the reclamation fund and to the Treasury.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. TAFT. I have no objection to the use of the reclamation fund, but as I read the bill, it authorizes the appropriation of $5,000,000 out of the General Treasury for the construction of 100 small reservoirs at any point that the Secretary wants to place them. That is $50,000 apiece. Does the Senator think this should be a general appropriation from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, the Senator will observe that that is an amendment which was put in in the committee, because of the fear of some members that the reclamation fund would not be large enough to accomplish this purpose, and because of the knowledge by members of the committee of the fundamental desirability of the suggested program. It is for this reason that I have been explaining to the Senator from Arizona that the accretion to the reclamation fund may be considerable in the very near future.

The Senator may recall that within the past few months the courts finally decided that the United States was entitled to lease a certain very valuable area of oil land in the State of California. It has been a producing section for many years. And it is estimated that that in itself will result in the accrual of several million dollars, maybe $6,000,000, to the Federal reclamation fund. The matter is now under study in the Department of the Interior as the result of a query addressed to the Department by the Senator from Arizona and myself.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that the purposes to be accomplished by an appropriation of this kind are highly desirable. There is no question that particularly in the Great Plains area, in the so-called Dust Bowl, where thousands and thousands of people have been driven off the land, these small reclamation projects are the very things that ought to be undertaken in order to allow the people to remain, rather than move away and become a burden on other States, as has been so graphically portrayed in books like The Grapes of Wrath. That proposal is entirely sound. Heretofore we have made appropriations of this kind out of the Federal Treasury because there was not enough money in the reclamation fund to carry on the work in that way. Of course, if the reclamation fund were a very large fund and there were great accretions of money coming into it, the picture would be different.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] brings out some new facts. There is a possibility that money will come in from another source, such as that recently assured us by the Supreme Court decision in the Elk Hills case in California, which, as he states, will bring in a very substantial sum of money. That decision makes the picture a little different; but personally I should like to obtain the facts and have them all before us before we act.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. If the Senator desires to study the matter a little further, I shall not press for consideration at this time.

Mr. HAYDEN. For that reason I prefer to have the bill go over until we may know exactly what we are doing.

PERMANENT IMPROVEMENTS INSTEAD OF "GHOST" CITIES

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Mr. President, before relinquishing the floor I desire to add another word. In the past when mineral resources in Western States and in other States have been exhausted, nothing has remained to give testimony of the wealth underground except a few "ghost" cities. Under the program of using oil royalties for the development of reclamation we have the possibility of permanent improvements upon the surface of the land to take the place of the mineral resources under the surface which have been taken out and spent. There are thousands of acres of land in the State of Wyoming, in the neighborhood of the Lance Creek field, which would benefit from the program which I suggest.

Mr. TAFT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Certainly.

Mr. TAFT. What bothers me is the appropriation from the general-revenue fund. If we want to build flood-control dams or anything of the sort in Ohio, we must have a report from the Army engineers, and then Congress must pass a bill authorizing the particular projects.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. Under the provisions of this bill an appropriation would have to be made for the particular projects.

Mr. TAFT. We seem to be authorizing a hundred different $50,000 dams which have not as yet been reported upon by the Reclamation Service, the Army engineers, or anybody else.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I think the Senator is mistaken in that respect. The present bill is the primary authorization; and no appropriation could be made until exactly the procedure the Senator has just outlined had been followed; and specific recommendation for a specific project would have to be submitted to the Appropriations Committee, of which the Senator is a member, before any of the money could be expended.

Mr. TAFT. In connection with flood-control expenditures we must authorize the expenditure for particular dams; and it seems to me that is a wise procedure. The question of the reclamation fund is a question which is entirely outside my objection. However, when it comes to the General Treasury, I believe particular projects ought to be authorized by Congress before we proceed to authorize the appropriation.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. The projects involved are very small.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. I yield.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have great sympathy for what the Senator from Wyoming is telling us. His predecessor, Senator Kendrick, was responsible for the enactment of the law which put a part of the oil royalties into the reclamation fund. As a result of that action it is my recollection—the Senator can verify it—that more than $30,000,000 has been paid in the past into the reclamation fund from oil royalties in Wyoming.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. In the State of Wyoming alone.

Mr. HAYDEN. What is the total amount now?

Mr. O'MAHONEY. It is in excess of that. I do not have the exact figures with me at the moment.

Mr. HAYDEN. If there were to be future substantial accretions to the fund from that source the picture would be different from what it now is. I should like to look into the matter a little further.

Mr. O'MAHONEY. As the Senator has said, the State of Wyoming has poured millions of dollars into the Federal Treasury in oil royalties. If we should eventually pass this bill—and, of course, I shall not press it at the moment—it would mean that a part of that money would come back to be a permanent endowment to the State. I shall call the bill up at a later time.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement which I prepared last Saturday with respect to royalties in the Lance Creek field may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks in connection with Senate bill 3136.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OIL ROYALTIES IN LANCE CREEK

A huge fund in oil royalties for Wyoming schools and roads and a similar fund for reclamation, the total estimated at not less than $10,000,000, will be available under the provisions of the O'Mahoney-Greever Act if a Government contest against claims of the Ohio and Continental oil companies in Lance Creek is successful.

For more than a year the Department of the Interior, under Secretary Ickes, has been investigating the charge that these two companies are holding more than 1,200 acres of the most valuable Lance Creek oil lands under invalid placer locations.

According to the reports which I have received, 15 wells, all of them producers of at least a thousand barrels each, have been drilled by these two companies on this area. If the information which has been given to me is correct and the Government succeeds in the contest it has initiated, this tract will probably rival the Salt Creek section 36 as a producer of revenue for the schools and counties of Wyoming and the State university. The Ohio and Continental oil companies are seeking to hold the lands under placer locations which require no royalty to be paid to the Government. If the Government prevails, the oil companies would have to surrender possession and the lands would be offered for sale at competitive bidding to the highest bidder. A huge bonus would in all probability have to be paid as well as annual royalties mounting into hundreds of thousands of dollars.

The Leasing Act provides that the royalties paid to the Government shall be divided between the State and the Federal Government. The State's share is 37½ percent of the total; 10 percent goes to the Federal Treasury, and the remaining 52½ percent goes to the reclamation fund. By State law, the royalty which goes to the State is divided among the common schools, among the counties for the building of roads, and to the State university for its support. Every citizen of the State thus participates in the benefits derived from the development of oil on the public domain.

One of the greatest difficulties we are now encountering with respect to the continued development of reclamation and the construction of small reservoirs in the West is to be found in the depletion of the reclamation fund. If this contest is successful, I am told that several million dollars would accrue to the reclamation fund. This would provide funds from which it would be possible to secure appropriations for the construction of small reservoirs under my reservoir bill, which was approved this week by the Senate Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

The area involved is outside of the original Lance Creek field. Placer locations were made almost 25 years ago but were then abandoned, according to the Government. It is charged that no effort was made to revive these locations until the recent activity in the Lance Creek field. It will be the contention of the Government that no work was done upon the lands by the Ohio and Continental companies or by any of the original locators until long after all rights had expired and the provisions of the Leasing Act had gone into effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 3784) for the relief of the estate of J. D. Warlick was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

C. Z. BUSH AND W. D. KENNEDY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 3481), for the relief of C. Z. Bush and W. D. Kennedy, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 6, after the words "sum of" to strike out "$2,500", and insert "$1,204.50", so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to C. Z. Bush, of Dawson, Ga., the sum of $1,204.50 for personal injuries sustained, and to W. D. Kennedy, of Dawson, Ga., the sum of $72.80 for property damage suffered, in full satisfaction of their claims against the United States, sustained when the automobile in which they were riding was struck by a National Park Service truck operated in connection with the Civilian Conservation Corps, on the Dawson-Albany Highway, near Dawson, Ga., on August 12, 1937: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 percent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or attorney on acocunt of services rendered in connection with this claim, and the same shall be unlawful, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SESQUICENTENNIAL ANNIVERSARY OF SIGNING OF FIRST UNITED STATES PATENT LAW

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 206) creating a joint committee to arrange for the celebration of the sesquicentennial anniversary of the signing of the first United States patent law was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby created a joint committee consisting of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Patents, the chairman of the House Committee on Patents, the Secretary of Commerce, the Commissioner of Patents, and five other members to be selected by them, with power and authority to make suitable arrangements for an appropriate observance of the sesquicentennial of the first United States patent law.

SEC. 2. That the President of the United States is requested to set aside April 10, 1940, as Inventors' and Patent Day to invite a general public commemoration of an event which has proved so important and salutary to this Nation.

SEC. 3. That the committee shall present to the Senate and the House of Representatives suggestions for suitable exercises whereby Congress may mark the anniversary.

The preamble was agreed to.

JOHN L. HINES

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to Calendar No. 1236, Senate bill 3038.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] objected when the bill was first called.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, when the bill was reached on the calendar I objected. I find that there is a proviso in the bill that there is to be no increase in retired pay. With the understanding that there is to be no increase in retired pay either now or hereafter, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3038) to provide for the advancement of John L. Hines on the retired list of the Army was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John L. Hines, formerly Chief of Staff of the Army of the United States and now major general on the retired list of the Army, shall, beginning with the date of the enactment of this Act, have the rank of a general on the retired list of the Army: Provided, That the said John L. Hines shall receive no increase in retired pay, allowances, or other pecuniary benefits by reason of the enactment of this Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the calendar.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its work today it adjourn until Thursday next.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE TO REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that during the adjournment of the Senate following today's session the Appropriations Committee may be authorized to report any measures before it on which it may be ready to act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ELIZABETH COSBY YOUNGER

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably, without amendment, Senate Resolution 230, and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 230) submitted by Mr. GLASS on February 7, 1940, was considered and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Elizabeth Cosby Younger, widow of Thomas L. Younger, late custodian of the Senate Office Building, a sum equal to 1 year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXPEDITIOUS SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES WITH THE UNITED STATES

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I give notice that as soon as possible after the disposition of the next appropriation bill I shall move to take up for consideration Senate bill 915, Calendar No. 475, to provide for the more expeditious settlement of disputes with the United States, and for other purposes. Our deceased friend, the late Senator Logan, reported this bill to the Senate at the last session of Congress.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there was so much disturbance that I did not hear the nature of the statement.

Mr. KING. I intend to press for consideration of the so-called Logan bill at as early a date as possible following the disposition of the next appropriation bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, of course the Senator may give notice to that effect. However, I think it ought to be stated that a few days ago a letter was received and put into the RECORD from Mr. Dean Acheson, who was chairman of a committee appointed by a former Attorney General to consider this whole subject. In that letter he states that the committee will require further time to study the subject. I hope the committee will be given further time, because I think the average Member of the Senate probably has not had an opportunity to study the full implications of the measure. I should not like to see it brought up until the committee has had sufficient time to study it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I feel that we have been very patient in failing to press for consideration at an earlier date. At least for the present I shall not modify the suggestion I made a moment ago.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. BARKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of several postmasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HILL in the chair). If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the nominations on the calendar.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION—NOMINATIONS PASSED OVER

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the nomination of Linus C. Glotzbach to be regional director of the W. P. A. for region VII, and that of S. L. Stolte to be work-projects administrator for Minnesota, will probably entail some discussion, I ask that they be passed over until the other nominations are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the two nominations referred to will be temporarily passed over, until the other nominations are acted upon.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philip B. Fleming to be Administrator of the Wage and Hour Division of the Department of Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Joseph T. Sylvester to be collector of customs for customs collection district No. 1, with headquarters at Portland, Maine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

POSTMASTERS—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the nomination of John V. Collard to be postmaster at North Collins, N. Y., be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

POSTMASTERS

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the remaining nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the remaining nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE MARINE CORPS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Marine Corps.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask that the nominations in the Marine Corps be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations in the Marine Corps are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar, except for the two nominations passed over.

WORK PROJECTS ADMINISTRATION NOMINATIONS PASSED OVER

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief explanation of the two nominations passed over.

Mr. Glotzbach has been nominated by the President for the post of regional director of the W. P. A. for region VII; and S. L. Stolte, of St. Paul, has been nominated to the position of work-projects administrator for Minnesota.

The committee took very full evidence in the matter; the typewritten record is quite elaborate. From that evidence it appears that Mr. Glotzbach was formerly assistant State administrator, was then promoted to be State administrator, and that while he was so serving what is known as the Woodrum amendment to the relief act was adopted. Under that amendment the hours of work were increased, the pay somewhat decreased, and certain persons who had been on the rolls for 18 months or more were dismissed. In Minneapolis there was a strike against this provision of the law. I think, probably, I had better read the provision of the law under which this action was taken. It is section 15a of the law and reads as follows:

SEC. 15. (a) The Commissioner shall fix a monthly earning schedule for persons engaged upon work projects financed in whole or in part from funds appropriated by section 1, which shall not substantially affect the current national average labor cost per person of the Work Projects Administration. After August 31, 1939, such monthly earning schedule shall not be varied for workers of the same type in different geographical areas to any greater extent than may be justified by differences in the cost of living. The Commissioner shall require that the hours of work for all persons engaged upon work projects financed in whole or in part by funds appropriated by section 1 shall (1) be 130 hours per month except that the Commissioner, in his discretion, may require a lesser number of hours of work per month in the case of relief workers with no dependents, and the earnings of such workers shall be correspondingly reduced, and (2) not exceed 8 hours in any day and shall not exceed 40 hours in any week.

There was a penalty attached in section 28 of that act.

SEC. 28. Any person who knowingly and with intent to defraud the United States makes any false statement in connection with any application for any work project, employment, or relief aid under the appropriations in this joint resolution, or diverts, or attempts to divert, or assists in diverting, for the benefit of any person or persons not entitled thereto, any portion of such appropriations, or any services or real or personal property acquired thereunder, or who knowingly, by means of any fraud, force, threat, intimidation, or boycott, or discrimination on account of race, religion, political affiliations, or membership in a labor organization, deprives any person—of any of the benefits to which he may be entitled under any such appropriations, or attempts so to do, or assists in so doing, or who disposes of, or assists in disposing of, except for the account of the United States, any property upon which there exists a lien securing a loan made under the provisions of this joint resolution or the Emergency Relief Appropriation Acts of 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and fined not more than $2,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both. The provisions of this section shall be in addition to, and not in substitution for, any other provisions of existing law, or of this joint resolution.

There was, in Minneapolis, a strike of the employees against this act. And it seems that the mayor of the city did not protect those who wanted to go to work, and the strikers prevented those who had been employed and wanted to go to work from going to work. The result was that there was a shut-down for a few days. Then the matter was settled by those who had been employed going back to work. In the meantime, an indictment for conspiracy to violate section 28 of the law to which I have referred was brought against, I think, 165 persons, if I am correct as to the number, who attempted to prevent, or were charged with conspiracy to prevent, persons who had been employed by W. P. A. from working. In due time the case came up for trial before the court. As I have said, it was a conspiracy case and they were all tried together. I believe 32 or 33 were convicted; the charges against 2 or 3 were dismissed by the court and the remainder, so far as I know and so far as the record which we have goes, are still pending. It may be that they have been dismissed since that time, but I do not think that appeared before the committee. At any rate, the leaders were convicted.

It seemed to the subcommittee—and the three members of the subcommittee were unanimous in their opinion—that this was a strike against a law passed by the Congress, and that it should not be excused, especially when the committee had before it the record of the conviction of those who had been engaged in the strike. Therefore, the subcommittee reported that in its judgment the nomination of Mr. Glotzbach and the nomination of Mr. Stolte should be confirmed.

What I have stated was the only reason given for their not being confirmed. There was no personal objection and, indeed, both men were shown by the evidence to be men of good character and standing. One of them, Mr. Glotzbach, appeared before the committee. He seemed to be a very fair man and had testified in the court case, but the United States district attorney for that district stated that he alone was responsible for the prosecution and that Mr. Glotzbach was simply under a subpena to testify in the case. Mr. Victor E. Anderson, United States attorney, wrote Senator BARKLEY from St. Paul under date of January 25, 1940, and I read from his letter as follows:

Upon direction of the Attorney General I had the grand jury reconvened to consider the violences that grew out of such W. P. A. strike, with the result that something like 168 individuals were indicted—

I said 165 were indicted; I was mistaken; the number was 168—either for a substantive offense of violating section 28 of the Emergency Appropriation Act of 1939 or for conspiracy to violate such provision. Of course, neither Mr. Glotzbach nor Mr. Stolte had anything to do with the reconvening of the grand jury, the proceedings had before such grand jury, or in the indictments that resulted from testimony produced before such grand jury. However, upon trials that were subsequently had, both of these gentlemen appeared under subpena and testified as Government witnesses.

Thirty-three of the defendants have thus far been convicted, two have been acquitted, and against three the charges were dismissed by the trial court. A number of these cases still remain for disposition and in all likelihood additional trials will be required unless by appropriate pleas as to certain defendants who were very active in the strike the cases are disposed by withdrawals of the pleas of not guilty.

I do not think it is necessary to read further from Mr. Anderson's letter.

The report of the subcommittee recommending the confirmation of the nominations of Mr. Glotzbach and Mr. Stolte was made to the full committee and the full committee—not unanimously but unanimously with the exception of one or two votes, if I recall correctly—voted to report the nominations favorably. That report is now before the Senate for action, either confirming or rejecting the nominations.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator has reminded the Senate that the report was unanimous with the exception of several Senators.

There was in Minnesota the labor disturbance to which the Senator from Tennessee has referred. I have objected to the confirmation of the nominations of Mr. Glotzbach and Mr. Stolte because of the policy they pursued. I did so before the subcommittee and the main committee, and do so now.

Labor has strenuously objected to the confirmation of their nominations. It is not only the junior Senator from Minnesota who is objecting, but also the Central Labor Union in Minneapolis, representing 40,000 members and 120 unions, whose resolutions of protest I have here, and also telegrams and statements by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, and others, against the policy which was pursued. I also have here as well an editorial which appeared in Labor, the weekly publication of the railroad brotherhoods, with which we are well acquainted, and numerous other newspaper articles which I ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matters referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., February 19, 1940.

Senator ERNEST LUNDEEN,

Senate Office Building, Floor of United States Senate:

Letter from Senator ALBEN W. BARKLEY received only this morning discloses he misread my letter regarding position of Central Labor Union on Glotzbach. He takes position we are in favor of Glotzbach, when you know we are drastically opposed. I wired him this morning immediately on receipt of his letter in endeavor to correct his position. If BARKLEY speaks or does anything in favor of Glotzbach, hope you will use this wire. Good luck and best wishes.

Editor, Minneapolis Labor Review.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., July 13, 1939.

Hon. ERNEST LUNDEEN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I enclose herewith a copy of a declaration relating to the W. P. A. situation which exists throughout the Nation adopted unanimously by a conference of the representatives of national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. This conference was held at the Washington Hotel, this city, on July 12. I respectfully request that you give this declaration careful and sympathetic consideration.

The representatives in attendance at the conference referred to represented many millions of workers affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. In the statements made by these representatives at the conference they reflected the deep feeling which exists among working people in the different communities throughout the land because of the elimination of the prevailing-rate-of-wage section from the W. P. A. relief measure recently enacted by the Congress of the United States.

In submitting the enclosed statement for your information and consideration, I appeal to you to remedy the existing economic situation prevailing among W. P. A. workers by giving support to a prevailing-rate provision to be applied on W. P. A. construction projects launched and carried forward in the different cities and towns throughout the Nation.

Very sincerely yours,

WM. GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO THE CONFERENCE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL UNIONS ON THE W. P. A. SITUATION.

(The report was unanimously adopted)

Both the Congress of the United States and the public have evidenced deep interest and manifested grave concern in the spontaneous strikes which have taken place within the past few days upon W. P. A. jobs in various parts of the country. These protests which have been against wage reductions have been erroneously interpreted as strikes against the Government when as a matter of fact they have been the mainfestations on the part of wage earners to maintain the standards of work and of wages built up through years of effort. The very lifeblood of a trade-union structure is the standard union rate of wages. It is perfectly understandable that our trade-unions shall use all of their economical strength by every legitimate means to maintain their respective standards of rates of wages on public as well as private enterprises.

The president of the American Federation of Labor, recognizing that immediate consideration should be given to this alarming situation and in order that a definite policy be approved for the guidance of organized labor as represented by the American Federation of Labor, has called this conference of the officers and representatives of national and international unions affiliated to the American Federation of Labor.

It should be evident to all concerned that wage earners in general and particularly those who have been organized for many years, do not lay down their tools unless some situation vitally affecting their interests has arisen which cannot be adjusted through the method of negotiations, conciliation, and arbitration. The cause for these Nation-wide protests, these spontaneous strikes, was an arbitrary increase in the hours of work for labor on W. P. A. work resulting in the reduction of hourly wages running over 50 percent in the hourly rate. This cutting of wages in half by the increasing of working hours was the result of action taken by the conferees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives working under a so-called emergency situation—the necessity of having W. P. A. appropriations made so that W. P. A. workers might be continued in their employment on July 1. Previously the House of Representatives had passed the W. P. A. measure which eliminated the prevailing-wage provision. The United States Senate had passed a measure which contained the prevailing-wage provision. Pressure was brought to bear on Congress to enact the W. P. A. appropriation bill before midnight June 30. This tremendous pressure for immediate action by Congress prevented adequate discussion of serious consequences that would follow immediately should the provisions of the prevailing wage be eliminated from the act. This action taken by Congress was seemingly a violation of the principles covering wage earners on all other Government projects which had heretofore been established by Congress. Congress had heretofore enacted, and the President signed, the Bacon-Davis Act which provides for the prevailing wage on work done by the Government. If enacted, and the President approved, the Walsh-Healey Act which provides for the payment of the prevailing wage on all manufactured goods purchased by the United States Government on all orders amounting to $10,000 or over. Ever since W. P. A. has functioned the prevailing wage has governed and has been paid under joint resolution of Congress whereby the President was authorized and did fix the rates of wages so as not to affect adversely or otherwise tend to decrease the going rates of wages paid for works of a similar nature.

It is clearly evident from the foregoing that the policy of the Government up to this time has been to establish, formulate, and administer its labor policy so as to protect the workers in the prevailing wages established and followed in free and private enterprise.

It has always been the definite policy of the Government up to this time to so protect and advance the rights of wage earners to collective bargaining in free enterprise in order that advanced standards of compensation and of working conditions might be established for all workers from time to time.

It is difficult and alarming to believe that the Government of the United States is now bent on a policy of wage cutting and of lengthening working hours and under the cloak of alleged relief bring additional suffering to the great mass of our wage earners.

When the original emergency appropriation was first enacted provision was made for a large building program under the Public Works Administration. Under it W. P. A. construction was first limited to $5,000 projects, and then to $25,000 projects. At the present time it has increased so tremendously that we find that one single construction project for revenue-producing purposes is under construction and embraces an expenditure of over $40,000,000. The wages of the men employed in this, as well as other large construction programs are now arbitrarily reduced by over 50 percent. Then too it is noteworthy that humans—the workers of our land—are now receiving much less consideration than is being shown to business and to commodities they sell. Neither Congress nor the Federal administration have heretofore attempted to reduce the price of materials. To the contrary, the attempt to reduce the cost of production has been placed entirely upon the shoulders of labor and is to be taken out of the sweat of the wage earners. As a matter of fact W. P. A. today is no longer engaged in a purely relief enterprise. It is engaged in construction work never designed for relief purposes and under cloak of a relief measure is working a vital injury not alone to labor but likewise to free enterprise in the construction of other fields of industry.

If the Government is to continue in its construction policy and in venturing into other fields in competition with free enterprise, then in our judgment it should prove an exemplar in the establishment and development of a labor policy that will tend to raise the standards of life and work rather than to lower them and repress our wage earners.

"There is a well established method for the redress of grievances—the right of protest, the right of petition, the right of appeal to Congress, and to be heard. This conference is aware that the Congress is now in session. In keeping with our rights this conference, therefore, petitions Congress immediately to redress grievances and wrongs herein complained of by immediately reenacting the provisions calling for the observance of the prevailing wage rate on W. P. A. projects. In order that these declarations and petition may be carried out without delay, your committee recommends that the president of the American Federation of Labor be authorized and directed to appoint a representative committee whose membership shall include the president of the American Federation of Labor, the presidents of the several departments of the American Federation of Labor, and such other officers of national and international unions as he may deem advisable."

We likewise recommend that this committee present this action of our conference and of this declaration and petition to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and to urge immediate and favorable cooperation in this effort to right these grievances and wrongs.

It is our further recommendation that upon adjournment of this conference the representatives of all unions in attendance visit their respective United States Senators and Congressmen, and urge upon them the necessity for immediate and favorable action on this petition. Then, too, we recommend that copies of this statement of grievances and petition for relief be forwarded immediatey to all central labor unions affiliated to the American Federation of Labor for their information and guidance.

FIGHT ON, GREEN URGES

Day letter.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 5, 1940.

GEORGE E. MURK,
18 North Eighth Street, Minneapolis:

Regret, because of engagements previously made, impossible to attend labor's dinner meeting at Minneapolis on January 6. The indictment and conviction of W. P. A. strikers in Minneapolis arouses resentment among all classes of working men and women. The American Federation of Labor sought to prevent such procedure through appeals that the Government cease and desist in its policy of prosecution. Now we feel it has resolved itself into persecution. We protest the action taken. We deplore it. In our opinion, men and women have a right to strike against injustice without being classified as criminals. We urge the officers and members of the American Federation of Labor to do all that lies within their power to have the sentences of W. P. A. workers set aside.

WILLIAM GREEN,
President, American Federation of Labor.

[From Minneapolis Labor Review of September 8, 1939]

"PERSECUTION," SAYS PRESIDENT GREEN ABOUT W. P. A. INDICTMENTS—GREEN PRAISES C. L. U. FOR AIDING DEFENSE OF W. P. A. MARTYRS—CONDEMNS WHOLESALE ARRESTS AND DRAGGING MANACLED VICTIMS THROUGH STREETS—"WORKING PEOPLE EVERYWHERE PROTEST AGAINST SUCH A POLICY PURSUED BY GOVERNMENT," HE DECLARES. BAD ENOUGH TO SUFFER PAIN OF UNEMPLOYMENT WITHOUT BEING PERSECUTED, A. F. OF L. PRESIDENT TELLS COMMITTEE

President William Green of the American Federation of Labor at Duluth Labor Day branded the indictment and arrest of W. P. A. workers as persecution, not prosecution.

The A. F. of L. chief displayed deep interest in the W. P. A. victims and commended the Minneapolis Central Labor Union for defending and seeking bail for them.

President Green's complete statement, reflecting the sentiment of 5,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor throughout the country, follows:

"It seems quite clear that the alleged prosecution of W. P. A. workers in Minneapolis is persecution.

"That is made clear in the wholesale arrests which have been made, the way in which the victims have been arrested, the manner in which they have been unnecessarily humiliated, and in the exorbitant bail which has been fixed.

"Working people everywhere protest against such a policy pursued by the Government at a time when more than 10,000,000 are unemployed.

"It is bad enough for workers to suffer the pain of unemployment; it is cruelty when the Government adds to this suffering through persecution such as is being inflicted on workers in Minneapolis.

"The membership of the American Federation of Labor will extend to these persecuted people their sympathy and full measure of moral support.

"The work of the Minneapolis Central Labor Union in defending these persecuted workers is to be commended."

President Green, who was in Duluth to deliver the Labor Day address, gave this statement to a committee that had been sent by the Minneapolis Central Labor Union W. P. A. defense committee to confer with him.

The committee was headed by Chairman George Murk of the defense committee. Other members were Organizer Roy Wier, of the Central Labor Union, and R. D. Cramer.

It was evident from the attitude of the A. F. of L. president that throughout the ranks of the A. F. of L. there is bitter resentment against the outrageous persecution that has been inflicted on Minneapolis W. P. A. workers.

[From Minneapolis Labor Review of July 14, 1939]

GREEN CALLS MEETING TO GAIN W. P. A. REPEAL

WASHINGTON, D. C.—William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, called a conference of the presidents of all the national and international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor to be held here July 12 to consider "the W. P. A. strike situation" caused by the provision in the W. P. A. Appropriation Act ending the payment of prevailing hourly wages to W. P. A. workers and increasing the number of hours per month for hundreds of thousands of those on W. P. A. rolls.

In a statement announcing the convening of the conference, Mr. Green said:

"The general discontent now manifesting itself throughout the country in strikes on W. P. A. projects is the inevitable consequence of the elimination of the prevailing-wage principle from the W. P. A. bill recently adopted by Congress.

"The entire Nation, as well as organized labor, had accepted the prevailing-wage principle as a fixed and permanent policy of the Government. It was incorporated in the Walsh-Healey Act, in the administration of the P. W. A., in Government construction projects, and in all relief measures since 1929.

"When the W. P. A. Act for the current fiscal year was passed by the House, the prevailing-wage clause was omitted. The American Federation of Labor then concentrated its fight in the Senate to have it restored. It was restored by the Senate. Then, for some mysterious reason, it was eliminated in the conference report which was finally adopted by Congress.

"While the W. P. A. Administrator favored the elimination of the prevailing-wage principle, we cannot believe he and his aides reflected the attitude of the administration on this subject.

"A vital principle is at stake. The wage standards of organized labor, built up through years of sacrifice, suffering, and collective bargaining are threatened.

"It is our purpose at the conference called for Wednesday to organize all the political and economic strength we possess in an effort to prevail upon Congress to amend the W. P. A. Act in conformity with the policy that has been consistently maintained for many years by the Government."

MINNEAPOLIS FACTS RELATED BY LABOR—BLAME FOR TROUBLE PLACED ON GLOTZBACH AND JITTERY STRIKE POLICE

Minneapolis is indebted to Labor, official weekly organ of the railroad unions, for getting the facts of the Minneapolis W. P. A. situation to its more than half million readers in the following article published last week:

"That Congress and the administration have made a frightful mess of unemployment relief is increasingly apparent as the disastrous results of legislation hastily put through a few hours before the beginning of this fiscal year becomes better understood.

"Labor's fears that chiseling employers would seize upon the new relief wage rates to batter down standards in industry are being tragically confirmed. Herbert Rivers, secretary of the A. F. of L. building-trades department, says he has been advised from several sections that contractors are demanding drastic reductions in union scales.

"If this program is not abandoned, Rivers declares, there will be an 'avalanche of strikes.'

RESENTMENT WIDESPREAD

"Thousands of men struck in various parts of the country. Most of them have gone back in a sullen and resentful mood. Other thousands have been summarily fired on orders of Col. Francis C. Harrington, W. P. A. Administrator, because they were away from their jobs 5 days.

"But this is only the beginning of trouble. Relief officials anticipate a thunderous protest next September, when workers in the North and West will be compelled to take substantial wage cuts.

SIX HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND TO LOSE JOBS

"Before that date 650,000 heads of families, representing more than 2,000,000 persons, will be turned adrift, to fend for themselves, and an undetermined number will be dropped from the rolls because they have been on relief for 18 months or longer.

"Relief officials concede that these drastic measures will be a body blow to the efficiency of the W. P. A. It will be reduced 'almost to zero,' according to Col. Brehon B. Somervell, administrator for New York City.

"The American Federation of Labor is trying to correct the situation through legislation, but has made no progress. For one thing, the legislative situation is against anything being done. For another, public sentiment has been inflamed against the relief workers by grossly exaggerated stories of the W. P. A. strike in Minneapolis.

POLICE GUNS BARK

"In that city guns barked and tear-gas bombs were thrown, with fatal results. A policeman died from a heart attack after a clash with pickets, and a bystander was fatally shot.

"Mayor G. E. Leach, of Minneapolis, in highly inflammatory statements, attempted to place responsibility on the strikers. He made hysterical appeals for Federal and State troops, the idea being to create the impression that the situation was out of hand.

"Labor communicated with responsible labor leaders in Minneapolis, and they declared Leach's own cops fomented the trouble, and that the Minnesota relief administrator must also assume a large share of the responsibility.

GLOTZBACH AND STOLTE HARD BOILED

"The strike, Labor's informant said, was entirely orderly until the police got tough. Had W. P. A. Administrator Glotzbach been interested in preserving peace, he would have closed down the project until the resentment and excitement had subsided.

"Glotzbach was determined, however, to show that he was the boss, and insisted that the work should go on. Pickets were thrown about the job, and the police came in. They manhandled the workers, and there was some resistance, but no violence, as far as the pickets were concerned. A policeman with a bad heart died from the excitement, and Mayor Leach proclaimed to the world he was a martyr.

BAD CASE OF JITTERS

"A day or two later policemen became jittery and laid down a barrage of tear gas, and followed it up with gunfire. One person was shot, but the bullet came from a police gun.

"A painstaking investigation by labor representatives and impartial citizens failed to disclose that a single picket carried a weapon.

"A dozen sensible policemen, with a proper appreciation of the rights of the workers, could easily have handled the situation. But that would not have been to the glory of Mayor Leach, who seized an opportunity to strut in the limelight and to capitalize the miseries of the jobless to make a Roman holiday for the vicious Citizens' Alliance, an organization of labor haters.

FACTS NOT REPORTED

"These facts were carefully omitted from newspaper dispatches sent out from Minneapolis, which sought to create an impression that rebellious reliefers were murdering innocent people in cold blood.

"Members of Congress and the President were fooled. When President William Green and a delegation of the A. F. of L. officials went to the White House to urge legislative relief, Roosevelt said that nothing could be done, and emphasized the Minneapolis situation as one reason why the administration would not intervene.

"Friends of labor in Congress said the bad impression created by the misleading stories made action impossible, even if the legislative situation were otherwise favorable.

CONCESSIONS TO LABOR

"On Wednesday an agreement was reached between Gov. Harold Stassen, of Minnesota, and the State W. P. A. administrator providing for resumption of the W. P. A. program in Minneapolis, and it was approved by Colonel Harrington.

"The agreement makes substantial concessions to the leaders of Minneapolis labor, who have gallantly supported the reliefers and endeavored to offset the effects of propaganda. The labor men insisted the strikers must not be penalized to the extent of being deprived of a chance to earn the necessaries of life.

"Glotzbach was disposed to be hard-boiled, but finally modified his position somewhat.

"Harrington said those who sign an affidavit that they have not engaged in illegal activities would be returned to the pay roll.

"That, apparently, composes the situation so far as Minneapolis is concerned, but it does not remove the damage resulting from giving the country an entirely erroneous picture of what took place there."

"The brutal conduct of the Department of Justice is as senseless a blunder as Hoover committed when he drove the bonus army out of Washington."—From the Racine Day.

Said Labor, weekly organ of the railway brotherhoods:

"As practically everyone expected, a jury in the (Minneapolis) Federal court has returned a verdict of guilty in the conspiracy case involving 25 poor men and women accused of participation in the W. P. A. strike last summer. The jury was practically hand-picked. * * * Victor Anderson, United States district attorney, closed proceedings with an intemperate address in which he attempted to hang the 'red' label on the defendants * * *."

NEW DEAL OR NEW SLAVERY?

The viciousness of the persecution of innocent W. P. A. workers becomes more apparent as the number of indictments, especially those of women, increases.

What in effect happened was that the Government through the machinations of Republican Congressmen and Senators who delight in bringing misery and starvation to those who do useful work and are not parasites like themselves, decreed that there must be approximately three times as much work for less than the paltry $60.50 a month that previously had been received.

Against this the W. P. A. workers very justly protested. They protested as anyone with an ounce of red blood in their veins would have done.

If there are businessmen who snarl about the conduct of these W. P. A. workers, let us ask this question:

What would businessmen who furnish machinery or material for W. P. A. work have done if a law had been enacted ordering them to furnish three times as much material and machinery for W. P. A. projects for less money than they had previously received for one-third as much material and machinery as they must now furnish?

Would the patriotic businessmen have praised the Government for this action and made no protest? Would they have continued to furnish three times as much material and machinery for one-third as much money as previously?

Do you say this question is ridiculous and outrageous, Mr. Businessman? We agree with you. It is ridiculous and outrageous. But it is not as ridiculous and outrageous and mean as asking W. P. A. workers to do three times as much work for less pay than previously.

It isn't, Mr. Businessman, because you would have enough money tucked away so that you and your family did not starve because of this outrage and this injustice. Unfortunately, a family can't save on $60.50 a month.

And so when a law was passed to turn this Nation into a Nazi concentration camp, W. P. A. workers who were real Americans protested against this devilish outrage and they were supported in their protest by organized labor and every citizen who is opposed to slow death by starvation.

Continuing to spit out indictment is not frightening or overaweing anybody. It is just simply proving that there does not seem to be any end to how outrageous and unjust the W. P. A. administration can be in the persecution of innocent workers.

Please tell us, somebody, why it is wrong for businessmen to furnish three times as much material and machinery to the W. P. A. for less money than they formerly received for one-third as much material and machinery, and it is right for workers to be compelled to do three times as much work on W. P. A. for less pay than they formerly got for one-third as much work.

What is this that is happening in W. P. A.? Is it the New Deal or the new slavery? You can answer for yourself.

THEY ARE PERSECUTED FOR YOU

Every member of organized labor is urged to give liberally tag day to raise funds for defense of W. P. A. victims. These persecuted workers aided in protecting the wage scales and so the homes of all workers. They fought for you. Give for them at the C. L. U.-W. P. A. defense tag day, Friday-Saturday.

[From Minneapolis Labor Review of October 6, 1939]

DO UNTO THEM AS THEY HAVE DONE UNTO YOU

Every worker in Minneapolis owes a debt of gratitude to the men and women workers of the W. P. A. who have been so signally honored as to be indicted for protesting against the starvation pay and increased hours reactionary Republicans and tory Democrats wrote into the W. P. A.

That legislation is part of the scheme of the United States Chamber of Commerce to reduce the wage scales of all workers in the Nation.

So that when those W. P. A. workers, many of them members of the A. F. of L., made their protest they were not protesting just for themselves and their families but for all the workers in the Nation and all their families.

They were playing their part in a heroic way to prevent the workers of this Nation from being driven into serfdom.

Particularly should the splendid conduct of these workers who are indicted be appreciated here in Minneapolis. Minneapolis workers should make it a matter of pride to see that these indicted workers receive the best possible defense, a defense that will acquit them and vindicate them.

There are many indicted. The expense will be great. But compared to the hundreds of thousands of dollars these W. P. A. heroes saved for the rest of the workers in Minneapolis, to say nothing of the millions saved the workers of the Nation by preventing wage cuts, the cost of the most expensive defense imaginable would be infinitesimal.

Indeed, it would be nothing in comparison to the fortunes saved the other workers by preventing wage reductions.

Bear this in mind today and Saturday when you are asked to buy a tag. Make a liberal contribution. Remember the money that has been saved for you by those you are asked to assist and do unto them as they have done unto you.

[From Northwestern Organizer of January 1, 1940]

"There is only one way labor can attain success, and that is through its militancy. Right or wrong, I stand by these W. P. A. strikers," he stated to sustained applause.

Goldie likened the mass trial of 25 strike defendants to the Moscow trials. Stormy acclaim greeted his closing statement that: "So far as the labor movement is concerned, none of you defendants are felons. You are honored heroes."

FARMERS CONCERNED

John Wisdorf, president of the Farm-Cooperative-Labor Council, was hailed appreciatively when he voiced his sympathy with all the indicted strikers. Wisdorf stated that farmers were very much concerned lest the "conspiracy" charge under which the Minneapolis unemployed are being convicted be applied to farmers and farm organizations.

Picturesque Tom Davis, when it came his turn to speak, said "the trial of these cases has been a lesson to me." He blasted the corrupt daily press for poisoning public opinion about the unfortunate strikers.

Other attorneys active in the defense, and representatives of the labor press, were introduced to the diners.

YOU SAID IT, BROTHER

Few workers will disagree with the following statement of Bernard Tasser, American Federation of Labor publicity chief, on the W. P. A. strike, published in the July issue of the New York Central Trades and Labor Council:

"I have a very definite opinion relative to those persons, no matter how high their positions, who have tried to smear the building workers by calling their refusal to work 'a strike against the Government.'

"I believe this opinion is identical with that of every union man in the country, and I am convinced that no worse blunder could ever be made by any public official than to try to outlaw the present highly effective peaceful protest stoppage of the building trades."

[North Dakota Union Farmer Supports W. P. A. Strike]

FARMERS BACK LABOR'S FIGHT ON W. P. A.

(The following editorial is reprinted from the July 17th issue of the North Dakota Union Farmer, leading organ of the Farmers Union):

What does all this hullabaloo about the 130 hours a month for W. P. A. workers mean? Why the strikes? That is what the farmers are wondering about.

Certainly asking a man to work 130 hours a month, or 32½ hours a week is not unreasonable—but the wages per month the W. P. A. worker will get remain exactly the same as when he worked about half that time.

Up until now W. P. A. workers have been paid the prevailing hourly wage which meant, in many trades, the union scale. But limited in the hours of work to a monthly "security wage" which was little enough for security.

Now they have to work many more hours for the same wage. Private employers will undoubtedly use the lower hourly wage of W. P. A. to batter down existing wage standards. As a result the purchasing power of nonrelief workers will be brought nearer to that of relief workers.

What does that mean to farmers who are already broken under the burden of a surplus because of underconsumption? It simply means more underconsumption and more surpluses of farm products and lower prices. It is to the farmers' own interest that they stand squarely with labor in vigorously protesting the inhuman relief measure passed by Congress.

Slashing hourly wage rates is just one of the inequitable features put in by the reactionary House Democrats. Another is the month's starvation period for W. P. A. employees after they have been on the job 18 months. A third is a decrease in the monthly wage, low enough now, in the Northern States. A fourth is reduction of the appropriation so that 2,000,000 instead of 3,000,000 will be employed by W. P. A., though there are still at least 11,000,000 persons out of work. A fifth is that after January 1, the States and municipalities will have to bear 25 percent of the cost, whether able or not.

Farmers fared quite well in securing appropriations for the various farm programs but if the city workers suffer, it will take even more Government assistance to make up for loss of the farmers' market.

F. B. I. INVESTIGATION IS OUTRAGEOUS SAYS THE DES MOINES FEDERATIONIST

LEGION CONDEMNS GLOTZBACH AND STOLTE—DENOUNCE LAW DEFIANCE W. P. A. CHIEFTAINS—WIDOWS AND ORPHANS OF VETERANS DECLARED VICTIMS OF THEIR LAWLESSNESS—BEARCAT POST GOES TO AID OFFICIALS' VICTIMS—ACTIONS GLOTZBACH AND STOLTE ARE BRANDED HIGH-HANDED AND ARBITRARY

High-handed and arbitrary action against widows and wives of veterans by W. P. A. Administrators Glotzbach and Stolte is bitterly condemned by the Bearcat Post of the American Legion.

This precious pair that have brought so much trouble to the workers of Minneapolis are charged with overriding the Federal civil-service laws to strike at the widows and wives of the heroes of the World War.

Glotzbach, the blatter for law and order, now condemned by the American Legion, is assailed as a defier of the law.

Widows and wives of veterans of the World War are protected by the provisions of the Federal civil service. But when you have to work for a living, apparently in the conception of Glotzbach and Stolte, the law does not protect you.

Condemning of this pair by the American Legion, it is hoped, may aid in opening the eyes of the public to the real aims and intentions of Glotzbach, the double-crosser of the late Floyd B. Olson, and his enthusiastic assistant, Stolte.

The resolution, unusual in its severity, coming from the conservative American Legion, it is hoped, may also open the eyes of the administration at Washington as to what enemies of the administration, the widows and daughters of veterans, and the veterans, this pair of bureaucrats drunk with power are.

The resolution follows. It was adopted at the meeting of Bearcat Post held August 11.

"Whereas both the Federal and State civil-service laws have granted to the widows of deceased veterans and to the wives of disabled veterans the same rights and privileges in the matter of employment as has been extended to all honorably discharged veterans; and

"Whereas many of the widows and wives of our deceased and disabled comrades are now employed by the Works Progress Administration on its various projects throughout Minnesota; and

"Whereas Administrators Glotzbach and Stolte, of the Minnesota W. P. A., have ruled that these widows and wives shall not enjoy the rights and privileges granted them under Federal and State statutes and has ruled that they must be separated from the positions under the 18-month lay-off rule now in force on the W. P. A.; and

"Whereas this is clearly a violation of the legal rights granted to such wives and widows of our unfortunate comrades: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, Minneapolis Bearcat Post, No 504, of the American Legion, Department of Minnesota, do hereby protest such high-handed and arbitrary action on the part of Administrators Glotzbach and Stolte, and demand that they adhere to the Federal statutes made and provided; further be it

"Resolved, That we demand that such portions of the lay-off order, which included the laying off of the widows and wives of our comrades, be rescinded."

[Northwestern Organizer says W. P. A. trials are political and unjust]

MAKING MOONEYS WHOLESALE

The New Republic wrote in its current issue:

"Minnesota is going ahead and making Saccos, Vanzettis, and Mooneys wholesale. Another 25 defendants have been found guilty of 'conspiracy' under the W. P. A. law. * * * As we said in our issue of November 8, the only real crime of which these people are guilty is that of protesting, like other W. P. A. workers all over the country, against the terrific reduction in W. P. A. wages on July 1. Any disturbance they created would be amply punished by a $5 fine. Instead, under a curious misuse of the W. P. A., which makes it an offense to interfere with the right of a relief worker to his job, the defendants are subject to a possible fine of $10,000 and 2 years in prison. Minnesotans admit this is a political trial, intended as a lesson to radicals. The chief lesson we see in it is that this is an extremely poor way to administer justice in a democracy."

Mr. LUNDEEN. The important question is, What is the background from which this unfortunate situation arose, and are we producing the kind of economic conditions that force needy people to stop work as a protest?

This situation arose out of the mistake in wiping out the prevailing wage rate on W. P. A., which had been the protection of organized labor for 50 years. It arose because Congress in 1939 began cutting the monthly wage rate of more than half the W. P. A. workers. The low-paid women on the sewing projects were cut eight to nine dollars a month out of their meager pay. What was the result of all this? All over the country on July 5 and 6, W. P. A. workers stopped work in protest against things that no American citizen should be compelled to endure.

These people were finally forced back to work with a statement, "Work at these substandard conditions or else starve." Is that the New Deal?

HOW THE 18-MONTH CLAUSE REALLY WORKS

Now, let us look at this marvelous idea—this 18-month clause. According to a report issued by Colonel Harrington, 775,000 W. P. A. workers were discharged last fall on the theory that if their jobs were taken away on W. P. A. they would somehow get private employment. Colonel Harrington reports that 2 to 3 months after these workers were fired from their W. P. A. jobs only 12.7 percent were able to secure employment in private industry. According to Colonel Harrington, this same number would have gotten jobs in private industry by the normal turn-over if the 18-month clause had not been adopted. Of those who got jobs in private industry, only one-half received as much wages as they had received on W. P. A. In other words, out of 775,000 W. P. A. workers discharged, only about 45,000 were receiving as much income as they had received on W. P. A. That is a fine certificate of credit for private industry. The rest of these figures should make us blush with shame. By November more than 50 percent of the discharged workers were again dependent on relief—about 380,000. About 25 percent of those fired managed to get back on W. P. A. The other 25 percent were on local relief rolls. Says Colonel Harrington in his report:

Large numbers were living on Federal surplus commodities because in many areas no local relief is available for employable cases.

Others, unable to find jobs or to secure public assistance, were dependent upon miscellaneous sources of income or were without any income whatever. The small earnings of secondary family members, aid received by other members of the family, the assistance of friends and relatives—these means had to suffice to support large numbers of separated workers. Approximately 100,000 of all those cut off received no income during the 2 weeks before they were interviewed. Some were living on savings from earlier short-lived jobs or on credit extended by grocers; others were forced to sell personal property or even to beg for left-over and unsalable food.

SURPLUS COMMODITIES NOT A SUBSTITUTE FOR 18-MONTH CLAUSE

Colonel Harrington's report states that "in many southern cities scarcely any workers who lost their W. P. A. jobs were getting local aid even of an emergency character. In these areas surplus commodities, distributed by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, constituted the only relief course of any significance."

What does "surplus commodities" mean? Well, it means exactly 1 cent per meal per person. I have been so informed according to a statement of one of the ranking officers of the Surplus Commodities Corporation. In other words, those of us who voted to throw these needy citizens off their W. P. A. jobs were voting, in effect, to compel them to live on 1 cent per meal. Is there any Member of this Senate who can stand here and defend that action? This situation also existed in some parts of the North. The report of Colonel Harrington continues:

For example, in Omaha, where 16 percent of the families reported surplus commodities as their major source of income, the only commodities distributed during November were flour, apples, and onions.

This calls to mind the old saying, "An apple a day keeps the doctor away, but an onion a day keeps everybody away." One housewife says: "We got flour, but what good is the flour without lard or baking powder? You can't eat flour raw. We got 5 pounds of dried beans, but I had to get a piece of meat to grease them with."

Here is what a man writes about his story: "The first month was not so bad. I held back the rent and used my last W. P. A. pay check on groceries and other necessities. The second month I could not pay the rent and used my credit for groceries and had to borrow from my friends. This last month I have been forced to the wall. My friends are beginning to avoid me; my creditors have closed in on me; I have been forced to break up my home, give up my children, and sell my furniture."

This has not affected only the W. P. A. workers. Colonel Harrington quotes a report from Texas which states:

The inability of W. P. A. workers to make regular payments on their bills has greatly reduced the income of the merchant.

In Omaha, again, we are told 1 family in every 19 reporting no regular income has resorted to canvassing markets, bakeries, and restaurants for left-over and unsalable food.

The breaking up of families due to these W. P. A. discharges was widespread, Colonel Harrington reports. In other words, we in this Senate who like to make glorious speeches to our constituents about the preservation of the American family have, by callous, cruel, and unthinking action, actually been helping to break up the American family. What effect has this had on the operation of the W. P. A. projects? The report says:

State administrators have reported that the immediate effect of the 18-month requirements was to increase administrative work and to reduce project efficiency * * * these enforced lay-offs may endanger some of the gains in project efficiency attained as a result of many months of steady effort.

I could go on for perhaps a long time telling you of the heartrending stories of misery and suffering caused by this 18-month clause, and yet it is interesting to note that a few days ago in this Senate a Member moved for immediate wiping out of this 18-month clause. We saw this generous action blocked by the administration.

MONTHLY WAGES CUT TO SUBSTANDARD LEVEL

Let me go on to the monthly wage aspect of our action in the last session. Congress passed a provision for readjustment of the wage scales in order to bring wages in different parts of the country more in line with the differences in the cost of living. One of the purposes of this provision which I heartily endorse was the lifting of the W. P. A. wages in the South. But what happened in addition to that? In thousands of communities in the East and North, in many of the States represented by Senators here, the monthly wages of the low-paid workers, the laborers, was cut five to six dollars a month. Thus many people who were earning the glorious sum of $57 a month were reduced to $52.

Those in the cities over 100,000, who had been earning $60 a month, or $14 a week, were cut by a generous administration to $57.20. Somehow I wonder how that 20 cents got in. But the New Deal administration did not stop here in its generosity. It examined the question of what to do for women, the bearers and guardians of our future generation. The New Deal administration remembered that many enlightened States have adopted laws for the protection of women in industry. So this administration decided to single out the women employed on W. P. A. for special attention. And so they placed these women, or at least the overwhelming majority of them, in a special "B" classification, and reduced their wages from $8 to $9 a month. And so these women throughout the country, coming home to their fatherless children, with their wages cut 15 to 20 percent, can give their story when the children ask for milk: "You see, children, this is the abundance of the Congress and the administration."

W. P. A. WORKERS UNABLE TO COLLECT EVEN THEIR REDUCED PAY

I have recently been interested in knowing whether the W. P. A. workers get every month at least this miserable security wage. I have been struck by the situation which has recently occurred, a situation that I think has not yet been brought to light. In many parts of the country, even including the South, projects were unable to operate in many cases for a period of weeks, due to the cold wave. In the situations affecting many hundreds of thousands of W. P. A. workers, the workers could not even get their security wage.

In some cases the projects were closed for 2 weeks, 3 weeks, a month. The workers were told that all they could do was to "make up the time at some future date." I know that within the last few weeks an appeal was made to President Roosevelt and to Colonel Harrington to step into the picture and do something to alleviate the distress to these employees of the Federal Government. What was the answer? W. P. A. could do nothing but just permit them to make up the time in the future, maybe 2, or 3, or 4 months hence.

It is true that surplus commodities were offered to these hungry employees of the Federal Government, but these commodities were offered in emergency situations and then on the basis of the generous additional allowance of one-half cent per person per meal. Let us look at this for a moment. Here are needy people on W. P. A. They have passed a relief test proving that they have no other resources. Cold weather comes, thus increasing their need for food, clothing, and shelter. What does a generous Government do? It says that in cases of real emergency it will increase their surplus-commodity allowance from 1 cent a meal per person to 1½ cents per meal. This is not Russia. This is not Germany. This is not Mussolini's Italy. This is not India, or even China, or Japan. This is America under the New Deal.

I want to touch again on this question of the 130-hour month. As we know, we lengthened the hours of labor for W. P. A. workers, cutting out the prevailing wages, and this was one of the causes of the protest strikes which I have referred to in this Glotzbach matter. There have been two interesting results of this 130-hour month. The first result is that it prevents W. P. A. workers from fully making up their time lost because the projects do not operate or because of illness. It is my belief that if we are going to keep the 130-hour month we ought to guarantee the payment every month at least of that miserable security wage, if the worker is prevented from working through no fault of his own. There has been a second result which Members of this Senate should know. We are all interested in having the W. P. A. workers get their share of private employment, yet I want to know how they are going to do it if they work 130 hours a month, and in many cases spend another 60 hours a month in going to and from the job.

ADMINISTRATION IS TO BLAME FOR DISTURBANCES ON WORK PROJECTS

What I have attempted to do here is to show the gentlemen of this House what some of the effects were of the bill we passed last summer. Here we have fired hundreds of thousands of workers on the 18-month clause and caused them endless suffering. We took away their prevailing wages, we cut their monthly wages, we prevent them from even earning the miserable monthly wage, and yet we wonder why there has been disturbances on the projects. I say that if there have been troubles on the projects the administration is responsible because of the blundering treatment of this problem.

NEW RECESSION UNDER WAY

But some of you will say that these problems are small; that we should deal with larger problems of our economic situation. Let us look at them. Today our Nation is entering a new recession. The war boom, which stirred so many to believe that the depression is over, has now collapsed. The Federal Reserve Board index of production, which was 128 in December 1939, is now down to 112. There are predictions that it will touch 100 before it is over. This would mean that the index would be back to exactly where it was in July 1939, and that over 1,000,000 workers who recently got jobs will be fired. As a matter of fact, with 600,000 new job seekers entering the market, we will have 600,000 more unemployed than before the boom started. This will probably bring our total unemployment up to more than 11,000,000.

Here is the calculation: In July 1929 there were 36,700,000 employed in nonagricultural industries. There were 2,000,000 unemployed, or a total of 38,700,000 available workers. By July 1940, 6,600,000 new workers will have entered the job market in the ensuing 11 years. This makes a total of 45,300,000 available workers in the nonagricultural industries.

By July 1940 it is probable that total employment in the industries will not be larger than 33,500,000. This would leave a total unemployment well over 11,000,000.

Now, it would seem as a matter of common sense, with this storm rushing toward us, that we put up an umbrella. Increased purchasing power in the hands of the masses of people might help to avert the effect of this recession. Yet what do we plan to do? On the basis of the appropriation passed by this Congress last summer, W. P. A. will be laying off 800,000 workers between now and the 30th of June. And if we pass only the $1,000,000,000, as requested by the President, another 300,000 will be discharged between July and September. In other words, instead of doing the sensible thing of putting up an umbrella, we are going to go out and get ourselves drenched to the skins. Instead of increasing purchasing power at a time when private employment will be decreasing, we plan to fire over 1,100,000. We plan to stop their pay checks from going into the hands of merchants, landlords, farmers. I ask Senators is this common sense?

ARMAMENT EXPENDITURES DO NOT OFFSET SEVERE W. P. A. CUT

Well, some say part of this cut in W. P. A. will be offset by armament expenditures. But will it? Any Government economist can tell you two things about W. P. A. and about armament expenditures. He can tell you that the W. P. A. dollar is the fastest moving dollar in the country; in other words, it produces the greatest net return in trade, purchasing power, and employment. He will tell you also that the armament dollar is the most sterile dollar in the country. It produces the fewest number of jobs; it produces the greatest profits. These profits often amount to 30 percent or more of the total outlay of the Government. It is doubtful in the next 4 or 5 months if armament expenditures will give employment to more than 100,000 of the 1,100,000 people who will be discharged from W. P. A. At the same time, also, we will be cutting farm security, N. Y. A., and C. C. C. expenditures. Before we build up these piles of armaments at the expense of the needy people of this country, let us give thought of who is to man the armaments. A survey of the National Youth Administration showed that in underprivileged families the health of 43 percent of the youth was so impaired that they probably would be rejected for employment by private industry. Obviously then, they would also be rejected by our armed forces.

Today Government economists could tell us that the only thing that prevents this recession from becoming a full-fledged collapse, as took place in 1937, is our export trade. This trade, as I will show, is composed largely today of war materials. It is interesting to raise the question of what would happen if England and France were to decide along about May or June that they would have to stop their purchases on a cash-and-carry basis and demand credit and ships. In the face of our weakened domestic situation, would they not be in a position to exert a great deal of leverage to force us to abandon the cash-and-carry plan? What I am trying to point out here is that the policy we are now pursuing is not only endangering the lives and welfare of our own people but it is endangering our peace as well.

When I deal with the pitiful provisions in the Relief Act passed last summer, I am trying to show its effect upon the whole life of this Nation.

I think it is about time we stop deluding ourselves and the people on this question of aid to the unemployed. We have seen three recovery waves dashed on the rocks of stupidity and selfishness. Are we going to continue to play around with this problem for 10 years more? Will the people stand for our experimenting around with it for 10 years more? It is about time we realized that we cannot preserve either our peace, our democracy, or liberties by starving fifteen to twenty million men, women, and children. We have to devise a program that is going to provide work and security for the American people at peacetime and not wartime pursuits. We have to stop these makeshift W. P. A. appropriations to last for 6 or 7 months or a year, and plan a works program to build schools, as well as battleships, hospitals as well as guns, roads and libraries and rural improvements as well as ammunition. We have to give our youth something to look forward to except poverty or war.

We have to provide a real works program to give real jobs, real work, and real wages. And then we will not have the kind of situation that occurred in Minneapolis and in other parts of the country.

I wish to recall the fact that we had a very fine gentleman at the head of this activity in Minnesota a while ago, a former Representative in Congress, Mr. Christgau. There was no objection to him personally; he was a fine man, but the policy he pursued was such that he was forced out of that office by labor in Minnesota. In spite of the fact that those above him said they would not discharge him, he was discharged, and, unless the gentlemen whose nominations are now before the Senate and which I assume are about to be confirmed, take a leaf from that record and mend their ways, they may find that the power of labor still exists in Minnesota.

Such a situation existed there that less than living wages were paid, and then many workers were thrown off and could not get back on the rolls. Then, of course, conditions became worse instead of better. Their protests were not heeded. You may call it a strike or a protest, or whatever you like, but I call attention to the fact that the court in this case made the statement—I think Senators saw the opinion, and I ask to have that portion of the instructions to the jury inserted in the RECORD—that these men had a right to protest and had a right to strike against these conditions, of course not using any violence or committing any overt acts; but they had a right to gather for protest and to strike and to picket and to urge others to join them, so long as it was a peaceful procedure and without overt acts or force.

This may well be the beginning—I would it were the end—of other instances like this. In a number of other States the same thing occurred, perhaps on a little smaller scale in some other States. Some of the clippings which I have inserted in the RECORD prove that statement.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point part of the instructions of the court to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the extracts referred to will be inserted in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

RIGHT TO STRIKE, AS STATED BY JUDGE JOYCE

Judge Joyce, in his charge to the jury, plainly stated that the defendants had a right to strike against the Government. On October 16, 1939, at 3:45, Judge Joyce, in his charge to the jury which sat in the case of the United States of America v. Myron A. Phillips, John Marshal, Leslie Wachter, Arnold Mullen, Ben Palmer, Carl Pemble, Richard L. Connell, and Gordon T. Smith, also known as Gordon Peterson, on page 27, said:

"They (the defendants) had a right to quit work and they had a right to strike and to protest conditions which to them appeared unjust or oppressive, and by peaceful and proper means to seek others to join them in protest and to support their cause by stopping work; and in furthering their efforts they had a right to indulge in peaceful picketing. Modern and enlightened laws enacted by Congress and interpreted by the courts have long since recognized such rights as existing."

Mind you, it was not Tom Davis, one of the defense attorneys; it was not one of the defendants who uttered that statement, but it was the Federal judge of the United States District Court of the Fourth Division, District of Minnesota, who said that these defendants had a right to strike.

On October 19, 1939, 1:30 p. m., on page 14, Judge Joyce once more stated that these workers had a right to strike when he delivered his charge to the jury sitting in the case of The United States of America v. William Reiley, Milton McLean, Charles R. Moore, and Charles Connors.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. LUNDEEN. I shall be very happy to have the Senator read from the instructions to the jury.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator, in reading the other day before the committee, read down to the word "existing." I asked that there might go in the committee record, and I now ask that there may go in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the matter coming immediately after that which has just been put in the RECORD by the Senator from Minnesota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Am I to understand that this extract is to follow the other extracts from the instructions to the jury?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. I will read the matter to which I refer:

But the rights just enumerated gave no basis for nor accorded to no person or persons the right to resort to intimidation, threats, force, or violence, or the doing of any other act prohibited by law, resorted to for the purpose of enforcing or compelling a yielding to his or their demands. One may avail himself of any peaceful and lawful means to better his condition or the condition of others with whom he believes he possesses interests in common.

Mr. LUNDEEN. That, of course, does not conflict with the original statement I made. It merely amplifies it, and I think it is in line with the statement I made.

I should like to mention this fact: The great American Congress will have to deal with labor on W. P. A. in a slightly different manner than we did under the law which was passed, unless we wish to have more protests and more difficulties, because these men and their families were forced into destitution and poverty such as cannot be described on this floor.

With the permission of the Senate, at a later time, I shall take opportunity to do so at a more favorable hour.

I believe that the voice of labor should be heeded. When they gather in conventions or pass resolutions, they should be inserted in the RECORD of the Congress for the information of Senators, and we should act favorably upon them. I hope the time may soon come when we will pass laws along this line so that there will be no objection, protest, and strikes.

I cannot understand how the administration is willing to send here the names of men who follow a policy hostile to labor. They built up a background which is hostility itself to the best interests of these men who were in W. P. A., and who were forced on the rolls by circumstances over which they had no control.

In this connection I may say that the business index is not favorable. It indicates a further depression; and men by the hundreds of thousands will be thrown off these rolls in the near future. I have stated that in some cases men were thrown off the rolls and were given as little as 1 cent per meal per day, and then they finally received an increase of one-half cent, so that it made the total a cent and a half per meal per day. I do not know that I should amplify that statement. I think it speaks for itself.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I do.

Mr. WILEY. I have listened to the remarks of the Senator. I should like to know just what these two gentlemen have been guilty of that would disqualify them for the positions to which they have been nominated. I do not understand just what they have done.

Mr. LUNDEEN. They have not been accused of any crime, so far as I know. They pursued toward labor a policy which brought about protests and strikes. They appeared at the trial and testified against labor, so that they brought upon themselves the protests and objections to their confirmation which I have here, from William Green, the Minnesota State Federation of Labor, the Central Labor Union, the Labor Review of Minneapolis, the publication called Labor—the organ of the railway brotherhoods here—and many other newspapers and periodicals. It was more a policy pursued than any specific thing, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. President, I include here two editorials bearing on this most important question.

THREE MILLION STARVING AS W. P. A. CUT RESULT

WASHINGTON.—How the millions dropped from relief rolls last summer are living was revealed this week by Col. Francis C. Harrington, W. P. A. Administrator, in a report showing what happened to 775,000 families, representing more than 3,000,000 such cases.

This purge was made compulsory by the last relief-appropriation bill, which contained the so-called Woodrum amendments. One stipulated that all persons who had been on W. P. A. rolls 18 months should be turned adrift.

Of the 775,000 persons laid off, 675,000 are still without jobs. Many of them are almost without food.

Families whose breadwinners were not reassigned to W. P. A. jobs have been compelled to exist on an average income of $3.23 a week. More than 20 percent have no income whatever. Some are helped by relatives, others are begging for unsalable food, still others are foraging in garbage pails. Some have died because they did not have medical care.

Children have been kept out of school for lack of food and clothing. Insurance policies have lapsed, household equipment and personal belongings have gone to pawnbrokers. Gas and electricity have been shut off and scraps of food were substituted for fuel. Many families have been evicted.

The Social Security Board disclosed that the average weekly grant to 6,668,000 persons on direct relief is $5.45 a month.

Congressman CLIFTON A. WOODRUM (Democrat, Virginia) has pledged a majority of the House committee handling relief bills not to vote for a penny more than $1,000,000,000 for relief this year.

That means, according to Colonel Harrington, that 775,000 additional families will be on their own after April next.

The Agricultural appropriation bill, reported by the House Appropriations Committee this week, carries about $500,000,000 less than was voted a year ago.

MINNEAPOLIS OUTRAGE

The Justice Department did the only sane thing to do in dismissing the remaining charges against 125 Minneapolis W. P. A. strikers. If this action reflects the policy of the new Attorney General, Robert Jackson, well and good.

But even if it does, it cannot alter the shabby—yes; the reactionary—role of the New Deal in this case. And the sentences dished out by Federal Judge Joyce, ranging up to 8 months in prison for the previously convicted "ringleaders," shows that the quality of his mercy is strained but too well.

The fact that only the militant Minneapolis strikers were singled out for prosecution, when the strike was Nation-wide and especially strong in Minnesota, New York, and Illinois, indicates someing phoney about the whole business.

And the speech in which Assistant Attorney General Rogge asked for the dismissals, saying that "the President felt * * * that the lesson had been learned, that the object sought had been attained," was a new way of requesting light sentences (which failed to materialize) as well as a new depth in condescension.

The whole sordid picture—the New Deal's weakening before the drive against W. P. A. and relief, the inhuman Woodrum amendments, the strike, the vicious police attacks on pickets, Roosevelt's "you can't strike against the Government" edict, the arrests, the drumming up of the cases, the fantastic charges of "conspiracy," the trial before an antilabor jury of small-business men and farmers—all this is a tragic token of what goes on here.

Together with the antitrust prosecutions, the increase in armaments, the cuts in relief, the talk of balancing the Budget, the hints of "emergency" powers, the slashes in farm subsidies and social services—it forms the pattern of the New Deal's "new" line for the masses: Business first.

That is Roosevelt's answer to labor and labor's friends who saw in him the great messiah who would lead us to the promised land.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, all that Mr. Stolte and Mr. Glotzbach did was to carry out the instructions which Colonel Harrington gave them in reference to the execution of the law. I do not think anything else was done. Colonel Harrington appeared before the committee and said that at all times these two gentlemen were acting under his instructions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Linus C. Glotzbach to be regional director, region VII, Work Projects Administration? [Putting the question:] The "ayes" have it, and the nomination is confirmed.

The question now is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of S. L. Stolte to be Work Projects Administrator for Minnesota? [Putting the question:] The "ayes" have it, and the nomination is confirmed.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that it is expected that the Senate will adjourn until Thursday, and may then adjourn until the following Monday, depending on the state of the calendar, I ask unanimous consent that the President be notified of the confirmation of these two nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY

Mr. BARKLEY. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn until Thursday next.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Thursday, February 22, 1940, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O heavenly Father, Giver of peace and rest to all mankind, look down upon Thy children. We pray that our labors may be great in their reality and appealing in their understanding. May we learn from the glory of our ancient faith the sacredness of life, the duty and the joy of righteous speech; thus may we reflect the holy life of Him whom we worship. We pray for faith triumphant even as the world is carrying in its breast the gushing fountain of poisonous hate, give us an increasing certainty that all things work together for good to them that love God. As we bravely face life with its countless distractions, crown us with an unfailing and unwithering strength of our holy religion. We praise Thee that neither height nor depth, nor any other creature can separate us from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Inspire us to adorn the House of Life with those fidelities which are the foretaste of the life eternal, in our Saviour's name, in love and mercy be Thou with our dear Speaker and the Congress and may no plague come nigh their dwelling places. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 16, 1940, was read and approved.

INAUGURATION OF PRESIDENT-ELECT ON JANUARY 20, 1941

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to Senate Concurrent Resolution No. 32, the Chair appoints the following Members on the joint committee to make the necessary arrangements for the inauguration of the president-elect on January 20, 1941:

Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas, Mr. DOUGHTON, of North Carolina, and Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to the order of the House of February 8, 1940, the Chair designates the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], to read Washington's Farewell Address on February 22 next.

HON. J. H. (CYCLONE) DAVIS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have asked for this time to announce the death of a former very able and distinguished Member of this House, the Honorable J. H. (Cyclone) Davis, who served in this body in 1914–16 as Congressman at Large from Texas.

Judge Davis passed away January 31, 1940, at his home in Kaufman, Tex., following a lingering illness of 2 years.

Hon. James Harvey Davis was born in Pickens District, S. C., December 24, 1852, the son of W. B. and Salina Moore Davis, and came with his parents in early childhood to Winnsboro, Tex., where he lived until he attained manhood. Soon after his marriage to Miss Belle Barton, born in Bellview, Rusk County, Tex., December 1, 1853, the daughter of Col. James Mattison Barton and Emily Miller Barton, he with his bride became citizens of Mount Vernon, Tex., where he lived until 1892, at which time they moved to Sulphur Springs, Tex. With the exception of the 2-year residence in Washing, D. C., when Judge Davis was serving in Congress, he remained a resident of Sulphur Springs until 2 years before his death. Interment was made in the City Cemetery at Sulphur Springs, by the side of his first wife, Mrs. Belle Barton Davis, who died September 7, 1934.

The first bill ever to be introduced in Congress providing for drafting money the same as men in the event of war was introduced by Judge Davis during his service in Congress. The bill was introduced after many conferences with the then Secretary of War, the Honorable Newton Baker.

During his entire life he was a crusader for the poor, the weak, and the unfortunate. For this reason he was never a rich man in this world's goods, but he built a life that will be remembered long after riches would have been forgotten. He did not receive the credit that he was justly entitled to receive for helping to initiate and sell to the country many progressive and humane measures that have been adopted in recent years. But the people who knew him will not forget the many and great contributions that he made in their interest and for their welfare.

I am inserting herewith an Associated Press article that appeared in the newspapers of the Nation soon after his death which discloses his interesting career:

KAUFMAN, TEX., January 31.—J. H. (Cyclone) Davis, 85, one-time Texas Congressman at Large, and prohibition leader, died here Wednesday.

The bearded, widely-known politician lately had interested himself in old-age pension questions.

Survivors include his widow and four sons, Arlon B. (Cyclone) Davis, of Dallas; Valton Davis and Roy Davis, of Sulphur Springs; and Landon Davis, of Hamlin; and a brother, Dr. Jeff Davis, of Roby.

It was in the Populist movement that blanketed the agrarian sections of the country in the decade before the turn of the century that Cyclone Davis attained his greatest prominence. He was one of the founders of the group that split from the old parties and grew into the Populist Party.

Davis, with evangelical zeal and burning oratory, threw himself into the movement that placed an aggresisve bloc in Congress.

Davis won the brevet, "Cyclone," afterward made a part of his legal name, in upholding a cause of the farmers. In March 1894 he debated the question at issue with Watt Hardin, attorney general of Kentucky, in that State's capitol, and was described in a newspaper story as "a cyclone from Texas."

For years thereafter "the Honorable Cyclone Davis of Texas" was food for the impish humor of Dana's New York Sun, along with Simpson, "the sockless Socrates of Medicine Lodge."

Davis was brought to Texas when 2 years old by his parents, W. B. and Elma Davis, from South Carolina, where he was born December 24, 1853. He was educated in the district or "common" schools, as he defined them, and taught school 5 years, beginning at 21.

In 1879, when 26, he was licensed to practice law and, as county judge of Franklin County during the administration of Governor Roberts, was said to be the youngest man on the bench in Texas. He practiced law 20 years and published a newspaper 17 years. In the latter capacity he was one of the founders of the Texas Press Association and one of its early presidents.

Davis interested himself in politics at an early age, joining the old Grange when 19, and for many years was one of the leaders of farmers' movements. In 1884 Davis and a group of other friends of Thomas A. Hendricks won wide publicity at the Democratic National Convention for their "slinging bandanna" handkerchiefs, and the tall, bearded Texan clung to that symbol of the proletariat throughout his life. The convention of 1884 nominated Grover Cleveland and Hendricks, the first Democratic Presidential ticket elected since the Civil War.

Since 1934 Davis had been the only survivor of a group of 70 prominent workers in behalf of the election of William J. Bryan in the Presidential campaign of 1900.

The only public office Davis held outside his home region was Representative at Large in the Sixty-fourth and Sixty-fifth Congresses.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE AND THE DIESEL ENGINE

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, there is on the high seas at the present time the fastest freighter that ever sailed from a United States port flying the American flag. Known as the Mormacpenn, the ship is propelled by four 7-cylinder 2-cycle Busch-Sulzer Diesel engines and develops 9,000 horsepower. The engines were constructed by the Busch-Sulzer Diesel Engine Co., of St. Louis, the pioneers in the development of Diesel engines in this country.

Naturally the engines are the latest type of Diesels. The cost to the corporation of developing this engine was tremendous, requiring research work over a period of many years.

I have contended for years this country erred in not installing Diesel engines not only in its merchant marine but also in Navy ships and Army transports. It is said the German pocket battleships have engines somewhat similar in design to those of the Mormacpenn. Not only is it possible now to use the cheapest oil due to improvements, but the ship can fuel in New York and travel around the world without refueling. Economically Diesels operate much below the cost of the turbine-propelled vessel.

In its recent trials the Mormacpenn reached a speed of approximately 19½ knots, almost 2 knots above requirements. The ship will operate between New York and South American ports, is of 17,500 tons displacement, 492 feet in length, a cargo capacity of 690,000 cubic feet, 30,000 cubic feet being refrigerated. It is essentially a cargo vessel, but the ship contains four large staterooms that will accommodate eight passengers. The few passengers will be required to eat with the officers, there being no public rooms on the ship.

The Mormacpenn will reach Pernambuco in 9 days, Bahia in 10 days, Santos in 14 days, and Rio Grande do Sul in 17 days, arriving at Buenos Aires in 19 days. This is allowing time in each port for discharge and loading cargo. In the past our slow freighters handicapped our efforts to get South American trade, but thanks to the Maritime Commission's building program, many speedy cargo ships are now in the making.

The vessel is so constructed as to provide speedy conversion into a naval auxiliary in the event of war.

The multiengined geared Diesel design installed in the Mormacpenn lends itself to economical and safe operation more than any other type of ship propulsion, as it gives a wide range of ship speeds with machinery operating at most efficient power. In the case of a turbine vessel or a single direct-connected Diesel, fuel economy is seriously affected when the vessel has to run at slow speed. Also this design permits and assists readiness to stop and back at full power, whereas the turbine vessel has less than 50 percent power astern. This design permits faster and safer maneuvering than does any other type.

Now, as to relative first cost. For years here in America there has been a greatly advertised antifactual propaganda spread around by some of the shipyards and other far-from-biased "authorities" that the first cost of a motorship was so much greater than that of a turbine vessel as to completely destroy the advantages of the former insofar as operating economy was concerned. This has been several times disproved by actual bids. There have been instances when yards have bid both ways—turbine versus Diesel—and in which the motorship price was larger than that of the steamer by more than the bid price of the Diesel engines. Such bids did not always come from yards equipped for building their own turbines, boilers, and so forth. Yards equipped to build steam machinery have a very good reason for preferring to build a steamer, as the latter permits productive use of expensive plant equipment which would be idle were the yard to have to buy Diesel engines.

The only yard at present equipped to build Diesels has frequently bid turbine or Diesel drive at the same price; at times it has bid lower for motorship construction.

In carrying out its building program for furnishing the large number of greatly needed American merchant vessels of several classes, types, and sizes, the Maritime Commission wisely decided to develop modern ships of Diesel as well as turbine propulsion. I here quote a paragraph from an article prepared by Admiral Land, Chairman of the Maritime Commission, for publication in the August 1939 Marine Engineering and Shipping Review:

> There are two major contributions by the Commission to the technical development of the shipbuilding industry. One is the high-pressure, high-temperature steam turbine power plant which is being experimentally installed in one of the Commission's C-3 type vessels. The other is not so much a development as a recognition—a recognition of the value and feasibility of the Diesel engine in all kinds of American merchant vessels. Before the Maritime Commission's building program got under way Diesel installations in this country were relatively few. Shipbuilders were equipped to build steam turbine ships. They had been building them for many years and saw no reason why they should humor the occasional ship operator who preferred the efficiency or the cleanliness of the Diesel.

As Admiral Lands says, the Diesel engine has finally been recognized. This recognition has been a long time on the way, but powerful interests from a selfish standpoint have left nothing undone to defeat efforts to advance the Diesel. History of ship construction shows the success that resulted from their campaigns, but by actual performance I predict the Diesel will demonstrate it is superior from every standpoint.

I have addressed myself on this subject several times in the past, my first remarks being made 10 years ago.

I sought recognition for the Diesel over this period and was bitterly disappointed when the three new ships for the Panama Line, a Government-owned corporation, were constructed. It so happened that I was responsible for the construction of those ships. I sailed on two of the old Panama Line ships, used as cargo ships during the construction of the Panama Canal and reconstructed as cargo passenger ships after the Canal was completed. They had outlived their usefulness, were extremely slow, but so constructed as to be able to weather a severe storm, many of which they had encountered in their years of service. In talking to the captains of the ships and also to the Governor of the Canal Zone, I learned there was a special replacement fund in the Treasury amounting to several millions of dollars that could only be used to replace these ships.

On my return to Washington I contacted the President. During our conversation I could see he doubted that I knew what I was talking about when I told him I found money in the Treasury that could only be allocated for ship construction. He promised to investigate and shortly thereafter he wrote me and advised he had ordered the ships replaced with money from this special fund which he found as I told him he would. Knowing the President's interest in ships I talked to him about installing Diesel engines in the new vessels. A private naval architect was employed and in the end the old turbine lobby again used its influence with the result that turbines rather than Diesels propelled the ships.

HISTORY OF THE DIESEL ENGINE

After 17 years of study and experimentation Dr. Rudolph Diesel, of Munich, Germany, in 1897, completed a successful new type of power-producing engine with a higher thermal efficiency than any other type that has been produced before or since.

In collaboration with the engineers of Krupp, and Augsburg Machine Works, of Germany, Sulzer Bros., of Switzerland, and Mr. Adolphus Busch, of St. Louis, Dr. Diesel developed the commercial engine that bears his name. Although the outstanding advantages of this new type of power-producing engine were at once recognized, it took about 10 years to introduce the Diesel in small sizes and another 10 years for it to gain a position as a serious competitor of steam engines, which had become well established as the accepted type of power plant.

During the past 40 years the Diesel engine has been thoroughly tried out in both stationary and marine service, and has shown a thermal efficiency which has never been approached by any other type of heat engine. In the average steam plant less than 15 percent of the heat energy contained in fuel is converted into mechanical energy; in the largest and most modern steam plants less than 25 percent of the heat energy contained in fuel is converted into mechanical energy; while in the Diesel engine, with utilization of waste heat in cooling water and exhaust gases, over 40 percent of the heat energy contained in the fuel is converted into mechanical energy.

In those countries in Europe where cheap fuel is not available, stationary Diesel engine power plants have been widely installed. Chile has an interconnected Diesel power plant system of over 40,000 horsepower. In Shanghai, China, is a 37,000 horsepower stationary Diesel plant.

But the greatest adoption of the Diesel engine has been for the propulsion of ships which must carry their own fuel. As the Diesel burns less fuel than steam engines with the same amount of fuel bunker, the ship can carry more cargo or can purchase fuel in the port of call where fuel is cheapest in price and bunker sufficient for the round voyage. Also the Diesel propelling engine takes up less space than the steam plant. It requires no warming up, while a steam plant must be slowly fired several hours before being placed in operation. Again the simple Diesel engine is self-contained, without such extensive auxiliary apparatus as steam boilers and condensers that are necessary for the steam engine, and therefore the Diesel propelling plant requires a smaller operating crew.

With the trend toward high-speed ocean transportation the cost of fuel has become an ever-increasing part of the cost of ship operation, and because of its greater efficiency and lower consumption of fuel the Diesel has to a great degree superseded steam for the propulsion of medium-size ocean-going passenger and cargo ships.

The unit size of Diesel engines has been rapidly increased. Some German cruisers are fitted with a Diesel plant. Superliners, requiring from 100,000 to 150,000 horsepower, are fitted with steam turbines, although it appears possible that at no distant date Diesels will be developed for even such size plants.

BRIEF HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN DIESEL ENGINE

It was a St. Louisian, the late Mr. Adolphus Busch, who was directly responsible for the advent of the American Diesel-engine industry.

It was Mr. Busch who purchased from Dr. Diesel in 1897 exclusive rights to the Diesel engine for the United States and Canada. He built at St. Louis in 1898 the first Diesel in the world to be placed in commercial service. From 1898 until the expiration of his basic Diesel patents in 1911 Mr. Busch pioneered alone in Diesel building in America, building several hundred stationary engines for installation in public-utility and industrial plants.

Dr. Diesel, from 1898 until his death in 1913, continued—as advisory engineer, director, and stockholder—his close association with the Busch enterprise, the only American industry in which Dr. Diesel ever participated, or with which he ever cooperated.

After the expiration of the basic Diesel patents other American manufacturers began building Diesel engines, until today there are over 50 American Diesel builders. The leading American firms have made arrangements for collaboration with leading European firms, especially in late years, when the more general adoption of the Diesel abroad has resulted in revolutionary development of new types of improved design and higher efficiency.

Mainly due to the abundance of cheap coal in this country, the Diesel was not so rapidly adopted for stationary power plants as it was in other countries.

In the United States there are now thousands of public-utility Diesel power plants.

One outstanding feature of the Diesel engine is that it eliminates smoke and ashes and requires only a small water supply.

Oil fuel has taken the place of coal in many sections of the world, and almost entirely is this true in speaking of vessels constructed by the leading maritime nations. Foreign countries long since saw the wisdom of installing Diesel engines in their ships, but it was not until the Maritime Commission came into being that the Diesel received any reasonable recognition in this country. Successful operation of the many ships now under construction in this country that will be propelled by Diesels will in the end compel this country as well as private shipowners when constructing ships to install nothing but Diesel engines.

There is in the making at the present time plans and specifications for the construction of an Army transport. I have already called to the attention of the Secretary of War the successful operation of the Diesel engine. This transport on every trip will pass through the Panama Canal and cross the Pacific. From the standpoint of eneconmy in operation, the War Department will be more than justified in insisting Diesel engines be installed in this vessel. With large corporations constructing Diesel engines in every section of the country, competition in bidding is assured.

In a recent statement before the Senate Appropriations Committee, Admiral Emory S. Land, chairman of the United States Maritime Commission, said in part:

The Maritime Commission is seeking to restore the American merchant fleet to its earlier vigor. This in substance, it was directed to do by the Congress. Looking toward that end, it has undertaken a long-range construction program, also at the direction of the Congress. The fundamental purpose is to assure the country of a modern, efficient, and aggressive merchant fleet. We need it for our foreign trade in peace and for the transportation of strategic war materials and as a naval auxiliary in war.

The Commission was created in 1936. Its basic program calls for the construction of 500 ships over a 10-year period. The new vessels are to provide replacements for obsolete ships and additions to the fleet where necessary. And I would like to emphasize that we did not undertake this program before making a very careful study of the entire merchant-marine problem. Upon the conclusions reached in that study we based our construction program. In other words, it was not an idea hatched in haste by an independent Government agency to be repented at leisure when funds were denied. Its principle was insisted upon by the Congress; its details were supplied by us.

The question is frequently asked, What will we do with all these ships?

Another which has been heard in the public forum is, With all our ships being laid up, why are we wasting all this money building new ones?

The answer to the first is, we are going to use them. The 20 completed are already in service, and operators are waiting for more.

The answer to the second is, we are not laying up "all our ships" or even a considerable handful.

The fact is, we could use more new ships than we now have available. And when I say use I mean sell to American operators.

I would like to state that the first type of ship which we have turned out has been proven the most efficient of its kind in the world. Compared, for instance, with the Hog Island vessel of the last war, the new one is 50 percent faster, yet it consumes fuel at less than half the rate of the old ship. Briefly, gentlemen, that means that modern American brains and technical skill have turned out a type of ship which, compared to her predecessor of 20 years ago, will save in fuel alone 35 to 40 percent of the entire construction cost over the ship's 20-year economic life span.

Of this type we are building 40. The record will show that we could sell more than 40.

I am sure that the members of this committee understand the importance of this increased vessel efficiency developed by the Commission both in its relation to economy of operation for commercial purposes and to the national defense, which is thereby assured of a fast and able auxiliary.

Mr. Speaker, the days of experimentation insofar as the Diesel engine is concerned are behind us. What we want now is not only a navy second to none but a merchant marine second to none. That can be accomplished by the construction of vessels of the best and most efficient type, fitted and equipped with the most modern, most efficient, and the most economical engines, machinery, and commercial appliances. It has been demonstrated the most efficient and economical engines are Diesels. Nothing but Diesels should be installed in our new cargo ships and transports, and we should also start placing them in Navy vessels.

Mr. COCHRAN asked and was given permission to extend his remarks and to include therein certain statements of Admiral Land before a Senate committee.

CALIFORNIA YOUTH LEGISLATURE

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks by printing a certain resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand a resolution adopted by the State Council of the California Youth Legislature at their meeting held in Fresno, Calif., February 3 and 4, 1940. This resolution opposes Army recruiting within the National Youth Administration.

I wish to state that I agree with these young people in their opposition to such practice. When I recall that there is a great demand to militarize the C. C. C., and that both the N. Y. A. and C. C. C. are made up of those who come from the lowest economic strata of society, I become alarmed at the trend.

Is it possible that we are planning to make cannon fodder of those whom industry and commerce cannot use? Is the Army going to be allowed to send smooth-talking recruiting officers into the midst of these young people, most of whom are busily engaged in completing their education? Are these young folks to be talked into enlisting into the service at the expense of the betterment of their mental training?

I do not wish to be misunderstood. I am not opposed to Army service. We need a well-trained Army in these troubled times.

What I am opposed to is the trend toward making one class of our society bear the burden for all classes. These young people who by accident of birth are the children of parents of victims of a fast-changing society should not bear the burden of protecting the lives and property of other young folk whose parents still are fortunate enough to have a fortune or a job. If the national safety demands recruits and the Army is unable to get them through the regular channels let us go about the matter in a way in keeping with a democracy. Let us not take advantage of the unfortunate situation of these people and induce them to do something they might regret for the remainder of their lives. After all, this business of being a soldier is a pretty serious undertaking these days.

There are those who claim that it is a great privilege to have the training that the Army gives and that the children of the poor are fortunate, indeed, to have the opportunity. To these I say, "If it is a good thing for the poor it is equally good for the well-to-do and the rich," and a cross section of all society should be the recipient of all the benefits this training affords. I would much prefer conscription to such undemocratic method as is to be used. Even Hitler plays no favorites when it comes to bearing the military burden.

I compliment the California Youth Legislature for its alertness in detecting undemocratic trends.

Resolution adopted by State Council of California Youth Legislature, meeting in Fresno, February 3–4, 1940, on Army recruiting and National Youth Administration

Whereas Army recruiting officers have been given the authority to demand and obtain from the National Youth Administration complete lists of the youth workers employed by National Youth Administration at any time, for the purposes of recruiting them into the Army; and

Whereas upon the demand of the Army, the National Youth Administration is to arrange and sponsor meetings of its youth employees, so that Army representatives may come to them for the purpose of recruiting them into the Army; and

Whereas such control by the Army of the civilian departments of the Government constitutes a threat to democratic government, the beginning of military regimentation of government administration; and

Whereas such control further constitutes the start of the militarization of American youth, and therefore is a threat to the freedom and civil rights of young people; and

Whereas the President of the United States is responsible for the administration of the Army and the National Youth Administration; and even he has not the right to so alter the purposes and functions of the National Youth Administration, which are defined by law as for the relief of needy young people; and

Whereas we vigorously oppose all steps toward militarization of the American people: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the State Council of the California Youth Legislature demand that:

1. National Youth Administrator Williams instantly withdraw his order authorizing the furnishing of lists by National Youth Administration to the Army; and authorizing the use of National Youth Administration for other military purposes.

2. The Secretary of War forbid the intrusion of his subordinates into the operation of the civilian departments.

3. The President issue appropriate orders to carry out the foregoing, and notify the employees of National Youth Administration of his action, so they will be able to resume their work and study with reasonable hope and security; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States, the Vice President, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the administrators of the Federal Security Agency, and the National Youth Administration, and the National Youth Administration of California; and to Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt; the American Youth Congress; and the press.

REPUBLICAN CONVENTION

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, the Republican Party is evidently going to hold its convention in the dark this year. They have just issued a long document, a preliminary platform, in which they completely dodge the power question, except to attack the T. V. A. and its yardstick, about which they show they know practically nothing, offer no relief from the exorbitant electric light and power rates the people are now paying, and promise no help for rural electrification, a matter in which farmers are most vitally interested.

I submit that this document ought to be published in Braille so that they can read it in the dark in their convention, because if they follow out the policy this platform indicates they would impose on the American people; that convention will be a complete blackout. [Applause.]

There was no objection.

PAYMENT OF NECESSARY EXPENSES INCURRED BY QUINAIELT INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2654, authorizing the payment of necessary expenses incurred by certain Indians allotted on the Quinaielt Reservation, State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a similar Senate bill, S. 643, may be substituted for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay the attorneys of record for those Quinaielt Indians who received their allotments on the Quinaielt Reservation, State of Washington, pursuant to judgments or decrees of a United States district or appellate court in a case wherein they were named parties plaintiff, the reasonable and fair value of the services rendered and expenses incurred, as heretofore fixed and determined by said Secretary; and the sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to make said payments, the amount so paid for the account of each allottee to be reimbursed to the United States out of any funds now or hereafter accruing to the account of each such Indian allottee from the sale of his or her allotment, or the timber thereon.

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the Senate bill to make it conform to the House bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A House bill (H. R. 2654) was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

SPECIAL MEXICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1821, to provide for the payment in full of the principal of awards of the Special Mixed Claims Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a very meritorious bill. It has been on the calendar for a long time. Many American citizens who suffered damages and financial loss are very much interested in the passage of this bill. It has been passed over two or three times now. This is a bill in which many people throughout this country are deeply interested. Unless my friend has some objection to the bill itself, I hope he will not press his unanimous-consent request.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I hope the gentleman will indulge me. He has caught me somewhat unaware, because my notes on it are in my office, but I think I could convince the gentleman if I had my notes here that there were valid objections. I wish the gentleman would not object to letting it go over without prejudice. If the gentleman will confer with me later, possibly he can remove some of the objections I have before the calendar is called next time. I am very willing to take into consideration the gentleman's suggestions.

Mr. McCORMACK. Of course, in view of the gentleman's statement, I will not object on this occasion.

Mr. FISH. May I inquire of the gentleman what his views are on this bill, because I sometimes agree with him and I would like to know whether I agree with him now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. McCORMACK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the fact that my friend from New York admits that he sometimes agrees with me is accepted by me as the highest compliment that I could receive. I will be frank and say that I agree with the gentleman from New York frequently.

Mr. FISH. Then I am sure we must be in accord. What is this discussion we are now engaged in?

Mr. McCORMACK. Is not the gentleman aware of the parliamentary situation?

Mr. FISH. No. I would like to be led by the distinguished gentleman once in a while. I am trying to get the facts.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman followed me the other day, and I think we were both in a good cause.

Mr. FISH. And we will win in the end, because we are right, and righteousness and truth always prevail.

Mr. McCORMACK. I think so, because diplomatic relations, for all practical purposes, were broken with Russia by the recent speech of the Chief Executive.

I think the bill is a good one. It is to recompense American citizens who received damages years ago, or the heirs of those killed or who have died. It came out of the gentleman's Committee on Foreign Affairs. It has been passed over three times. I think it is a meritorious bill.

Mr. FISH. How much money does this involve?

Mr. McCORMACK. I am informed the amount of the bill is $2,598,000.

Mr. THOMASON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. THOMASON. To my mind, it is not so much a question of the amount of the claim as it is the justness of the claim. I have personal knowledge of many of these claims and acquaintance with a lot of the people along the Mexican border who sustained serious losses. Some of my constituents in El Paso and along the Mexican border have waited patiently for years for action in this matter. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has approved this bill. My recollection is that a similar bill has passed the Senate. It seems to me that in all fairness and in all justice some action ought to be taken. These people have a right to know whether they are ever going to recover some of the money to which they are justly entitled. These claimants are innocent in the matter, and it is only fair that the bill be taken up and also debated and voted upon. I hope my friend will not object.

Mr. FISH. Does this include the claim of the Illinois Central Railroad?

Mr. THOMASON. I am not sure who all the claimants are, for I do not have the bill before me at this minute. I do know that many American citizens sustained losses and have never received a cent. They are entitled to have this bill heard and considered. I know that it has much merit in it.

Mr. FISH. Is this the bill that requires the United States to dig into the Federal Treasury and pay out money that some foreign government has never paid us? If that is the precedent we are setting, I am absolutely against this bill and find myself forced against my will to differ with my friend from Massachusetts, whom I like so much.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] knows that this is a bill that has been taken up by the committee. I believe the gentleman from New York voted for it. It covers claims that have been brought before the Department and of which they have approved. There is no reason why this bill should not go through at the present time.

The regular order was demanded.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under reservation of objection, I may state that I have no objection to the bills going over this time, but the next time it comes up I will object to a similar request.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under those conditions I object to the request. We might as well bring the matter to a head now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FISH, Mr. COSTELLO, and Mr. CHURCH objected.

SAN FRANCISCO BAY EXPOSITION

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 242, to authorize the appropriation of an additional sum of $606,650 for Federal participation in the world's fair to be held by the San Francisco Bay Exposition, Inc., in the city of San Francisco during the year 1939.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this joint resolution be stricken from the Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

MEXICAN CLAIMS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 326, for the payment of awards and appraisals heretofore made in favor of citizens of the United States on claims presented under the General Claims Convention of September 8, 1923, United States and Mexico.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

ANNUAL AND SICK LEAVE OF CERTAIN POSTMASTERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5784, to provide for the conservation and transfer of accumulated sick leave and vacation time due classified civil-service employees who succeed to the position of postmaster, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That every classified civil-service employee in a first- or second-class post office who shall be appointed to the position of postmaster shall retain to his credit whatever amount of sick leave and vacation time is properly due him on the date of his appointment to the position of postmaster: Provided, That such accumulated sick leave and vacation time shall be transferred to the credit of the employee as of the date of his appointment as postmaster in the same manner as the time might have been utilized by him before appointment: Provided further, That this act shall be retroactive to the extent that every postmaster at a first- or second-class post office who shall have received appointment as postmaster while an employee of the classified civil-service and who shall hold the position of postmaster on the date this act becomes effective, shall be entitled to the benefits of the act and shall be credited with the amount of accumulated sick leave and vacation time which was due him on the date of his appointment as postmaster: Provided further, That all laws and parts of laws inconsistent with this act shall be repealed.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, lines 3 and 4, strike out the words "in a first- or second-class post office".

On page 2, line 13, strike out the words "shall be" and insert in lieu thereof the words "are hereby".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MERITORIOUS SERVICE MEDAL FOR CIVIL SERVICE OFFICERS AND EMPLOYEES

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]?

Mr. FADDIS and Mr. RAMSPECK objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN, Mr. COSTELLO, and Mr. FADDIS objected.

GOOD BEHAVIOR OF UNITED STATES DISTRICT JUDGES

Mr. WALTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALTER]?

There was no objection.

ERECTION OF MONUMENT TO MEMORY OF FATHER PIERRE GIBAULT

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 219, to provide for the erection of a monument to the memory of the patriot priest, Father Pierre Gibault.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $50,000 be, and the same is hereby, authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of a monument to the memory of the patriot priest, Father Pierre Gibault, at Cahokia, in the State of Illinois, with the advice of the Commissioner of Fine Arts. The said sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That the county of Saint Clair or the citizens thereof shall cede and convey to the United States such suitable site as may in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior be required for said monument: And provided further, That the United States shall have no responsibility for the care and upkeep of the monument.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "Commissioner" and insert "Commission."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RADIO REQUIREMENTS FOR SHIPS ON GREAT LAKES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7863) to amend section 602 (e) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended, relating to a study of radio requirements for ships navigating the Great Lakes and inland waters of the United States.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 602 (e) of the Communications Act of 1934, as amended (50 Stat. 197; U. S. C., 1934 ed. Supp. IV, title 47, sec. 602), is hereby amended by striking out the words "not later than December 31, 1939", and inserting in lieu thereof the words "as soon as practicable but not later than January 1, 1941".

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING MARITIME COMMISSION TO ACQUIRE CERTAIN LANDS, ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

The Clerk called House Joint Resolution 424, to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to acquire certain lands at St. Petersburg, Fla.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Maritime Commission is hereby authorized, with funds in the construction fund of the Commission, to acquire on behalf of the United States by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, and pay all costs incident to the examination, transfer, and perfecting of title to that certain tract of land aggregating 10.05 acres, more or less, situated and being in the county of Pinellas, State of Florida, together with the structures thereon, described as follows:

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

BARRING CLAIMS AGAINST THE UNITED STATES

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 8150) providing for the barring of claims against the United States.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. BURDICK. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURDICK, Mr. O'CONNOR, and Mr. CASE of South Dakota objected.

AMENDING CROP-LOAN LAW

The Clerk called the bill (H. R. 7878) to amend the crop-loan law relating to the lien imposed thereunder, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Michigan to withdraw that request so that I may make an explanation under the reservation of an objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I have read the bill and report very carefully and it seems to me that the bill is really a bill for the relief of the landlord. It secures the landlord's share and lessens the security of the Government. I think it so amends the policy with respect to these loans as to point to an entirely new policy with respect to crop loans. It is too important a bill to be taken up by unanimous consent.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's statement and do not care to argue the matter other than to say that the first part of the bill just prevents the Farm Credit Administration from taking a lien on a farmer's particular crop as a whole. Just that crop that is financed with the proceeds of the loan is subject to the lien. As the law now stands his entire crop is subject to the lien. As I understand, it is the second portion of the bill to which the gentleman from Michigan objects—the elimination of the landlord's waiver of his lien. I do not ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection, but if he feels the bill should be objected to, I shall have to accede to his demand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Possibly debate would clear up some of the objections that I have.

Mr. DOXEY. We did not have much objection in our committee. We gave this bill very thorough consideration. This bill was reported by our chairman, and I just wanted to know what was in the mind of the gentleman from Michigan so that we could clear it up, if possible, and pass this bill today.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Personally, I do not see why the landlord should not take a little chance along with the tenant on the loans which are made to capitalize his investment.

Mr. DOXEY. The principle and purpose is to enable the borrower to get the loan by putting up his interest in the crop, so that he does not have to be barred in case the landlord does not want to go along with him. It is all in the interest of the borrower. That is the simple explanation to this portion of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. But I should think it would be very much to the interest of the landlord if he is relieved from having to put up his share as a part of the security for the loan.

Mr. DOXEY. It is a matter of negotiation between the borrower and the lender, of course. As the law now exists the landlord can block the sharecropper or tenant from getting any money at all from the Farm Credit Administration if he does not waive his lien. We are trying to eliminate that hardship on the tenant or sharecropper. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I am sure if that is the case, as the gentleman says, that the Rules Committee will be pleased to grant a rule for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. DOXEY. I just rose for the purpose of trying to persuade the gentleman from Michigan to not object. It is time now to loan money on the crop, and time is quite an element in this bill. The Committee on Agriculture was anxious to have it passed on the Consent Calendar if possible. Of course, I appreciate the gentleman's position. I would like to have him withdraw his request that it be passed over, but if he does not, I yield to his judgment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. COOPER). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT] that the bill be passed over without prejudice?

There was no objection.

DISCRIMINATION AGAINST GRADUATES OF CERTAIN LAW SCHOOLS, ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1610, to prevent discrimination against graduates of certain schools, and those acquiring their legal education in law offices, in the making of appointments to Government positions, the qualifications for which include legal training or legal experience.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if there is no explanation of this bill, I would ask that it go over without prejudice.

Mr. McCORMACK. Reserving the right to object, I may say that I have read the report with interest, because I was very much interested in this bill. There is a practice that has developed over the years in connection with civil-service examinations for lawyers and doctors. While this bill does not cover doctors, I think it should cover the medical profession as well.

Mr. McLEAN. And economists?

Mr. McCORMACK. Well, anyone who is affected. I think the civil service should be open to everybody who meets the requirements and that the examination should be sufficiently difficult so that those only who are eminently qualified can pass. But there has been a system developed, unfortunately, where, as I understand it—and say this with some reservations, but I have had some exchange of letters with the Civil Service Commission in the past—where the Civil Service Commission permits considerable latitude to a department in writing the requirements of eligibility. True, the Civil Service Commission can disapprove the requirements, but it is very rare. As the result of the requirements written, the practical results are that only the graduates of certain schools, or men with certain experience, can qualify; the objective usually being—and I say this not in any harshly critical way, but from the angle of constructive criticism—to confine it to a small group. I think that all lawyers should be eligible to take civil-service examinations. I think all doctors should, and all others should.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. This bill was introduced by the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who is a very careful and conservative man in his views and never introduces legislation unless he knows the need of it. This bill passed the Senate. I am somewhat familiar with the need of the legislation. It grows out of the practice which I think has resulted in discrimination against graduates of smaller colleges and schools and in favor of selected groups of large colleges. It is not to give one group an advantage over another, but to treat all alike and let it rest upon educational qualifications, without favoritism. I think the principle enunciated is fair, and the bill ought to pass.

Mr. McLEAN. What is the use of encumbering the statutes with a lot of laws that we pay no attention to? We have a law on the statute books that provides that no lawyer who has been connected with the Government service shall be allowed to practice law against Government or in the departments for 2 years after he leaves the service. We have had about six or eight bills here to exempt certain individuals from the provisions of that law. Not only do we allow them to retire from the Government service and immediately engage in practice in matters where the Government is concerned and before the departments, but they have taken with them unfinished Government matters on which they had been engaged and they are continued in Government employ and are paid annual salaries while they are at the same time practicing law and taking business against the Government. I do not see why we should encumber our statutes with a lot of laws that mean nothing and to which we are going to pass exceptions not only for schools, but for particular individuals.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Permit me to say that I agree with the gentleman, that laws ought to be enforced. I am in favor of the enforcement of all laws. But I ask the gentleman from New Jersey, Are you going to invoke the doctrine that because some laws are not enforced you will force us later to correct an injustice or discrimination which is sought to be corrected here? It will do justice to those who come from the smaller as well as the larger colleges and the gentleman's sense of fairness should prevent him from objecting to this bill.

Mr. McLEAN. I would like to know more of the background of this bill, what is behind it, and the circumstances which brought it here.

Mr. McCORMACK. They have a list of certain law schools in this country from which certain individuals will be taken.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New Jersey yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. This bill arises out of a ruling made by an appointing officer in the Department of Agriculture. And right here I would like to correct an impression unintentionally made by the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts. It did not arise out of any civil-service procedure, but out of a rule made by an officer in the Department of Agriculture on non-civil-service jobs. He announced that he would not consider for any legal position any lawyer who had not graduated from a school approved by the American Association of Law Schools.

The Senate passed this bill to prevent the application of that rule, taking the position, which I think is sound, that it is not where a man gets his qualifications, but has he got them, that ought to be the test as to whether he can be employed by the Government.

The Civil Service Commission, while opposed to this bill, points out that it is in line in most cases with their practice. It is true that in a few cases for specialized legal work they have required certain educational qualifications.

The purpose of the bill is to prevent any appointing officer in the Government from setting up a rule that he will not take lawyers unless they come from a particular group of law schools.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not want anything I said to be construed as a criticism of the Civil Service Commission, because I have a profound respect for the Commission, its members, and the manner of administration.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I know the gentleman has.

Mr. McCORMACK. But I do say that within the past 2 years I had a situation where a young man, a doctor, who came up the hard way, unable to attend an outstanding medical school, but came up the hard way, studied nights, served his internship; yet as a result of requirements laid down in the department, and which the Civil Service Commission approved—I suppose they collaborate with the departments as to the requirements—this man and the group he represented—and there must be many throughout the country—were unable to take the examination.

I say we want the best men in the service, but no American should be barred from taking the examination. The examination should be hard enough, severe enough, and strict enough—and it can be made so—in order that only the best qualified and most learned of those aspiring can pass the examination. In other words, opportunity of application and examination should not, in my opinion, be denied to anyone.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I agree with him 1,000 percent.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman accept an amendment to include doctors also?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I have no objection to such an amendment. As a matter of fact, I have told the Commission time and time again that I did not believe they ought to announce an examination where they prohibited the substitution of experience for educational qualifications. I believe any man ought to be entitled to demonstrate his ability, regardless of whether he ever graduated from a school or college.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. I understand that the necessity for this legislation is brought about because of the arbitrary decision of some bureaucrat here in this city that he will or will not appoint a man from such and such a school. Is that true?

Mr. McCORMACK. In effect, yes.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, suggestions have been made that we include doctors, economists, social-service workers, dentists, and other groups. I think we ought to give this matter further study and have the bill passed over until we can perfect amendments to take care of these situations.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. Does not the gentleman believe it is time the House took some definite action to prevent such peremptory action on the part of bureaucrats downtown?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes; and I think, also, it is time we stopped lawyers resigning from the Government service, taking Government business with them, continuing on the pay roll, and allowing them at the same time to take cases against the Government within the time limit of the law.

I press my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN]?

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I realize the gentleman's request is made from an angle that is favorable to legislation of this type and in order to enable more consideration of the bill by the Members. I personally favor the bill, but I believe it should be broadened.

Mr. McKEOUGH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, I am in sympathy with the idea of broadening the provisions of this act. In this connection I merely call attention to the fact that when this bill reached the House there was an amendment offered in the House Committee on the Civil Service striking out in lines 10, 11, and 12 a provision that no discrimination should apply to anyone taking an examination because of any racial or religious group or organization affiliations. I direct attention to that particular language of the Senate draft in the hope that when the bill is revised by the House Civil Service Committee the provision may be retained as passed in the Senate, because if we are going to provide for an inability on the part of these so-called bureaucrats to set up extralegal provisions which the Congress of the United States does not enact, I certainly claim that in keeping with the fundamental provisions of the Constitution of our country, no discrimination should apply to any citizen of this Nation seeking to enter the Government service because of racial or religious group or organization affiliations, and I hope that will be cared for when the committee revises this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN]?

Mr. MOSER. Mr. Speaker, I object. I may remark that this bill was reported unanimously by the House Committee on the Civil Service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

AMENDMENT OF SERVICE PENSIONS ACTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7147, to amend the service-pension acts pertaining to the War with Spain, Philippine Insurrection, and the China Relief Expedition to include certain continuous service.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in determining the period of active service for the purpose of the act of May 1, 1926 (Public Law No. 166, 69th Cong.), the act of June 2, 1930 (Public Law No. 299, 71st Cong.), and the act of May 24, 1938 (Public Law No. 541, 75th Cong.), granting service pensions to veterans and dependants of deceased veterans of the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, and the China Relief Expedition, continuous active service entered into during the War with Spain, the Philippine Insurrection, or the China Relief Expedition shall be included although part of such continuous service extended into either the Philippine Insurrection or the China Relief Expedition.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 10, after the word "Insurrection", strike out the word "and" and insert "or."

On page 2, after line 5, insert a new provision as follows: "Payments of benefits under the provisions of this act shall be effective the date of enactment thereof as to those persons on the rolls and as to claims pending on the date of enactment of this act. In all other cases awards of pension authorized hereunder shall be effective from date of application therefor after the date of enactment of this act."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MILEAGE TABLES FOR UNITED STATES ARMY AND OTHER GOVERNMENT AGENCIES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 506, relating to mileage tables for the United States Army and other Government agencies and to mileage allowances for persons employed in the offices of Members of House and Senate.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

There was no objection.

ESTABLISHMENT OF A GREENVILLE MEMORIAL COMMISSION

The Clerk called the next business, House Joint Resolution 385 establishing a Greenville Memorial Commission to formulate plans for the construction of a memorial building to commemorate the Treaty of Greene Ville at Greenville, Ohio.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas Greenville, Ohio, is the site of Fort Greene Ville, where was signed the famous Treaty of Greene Ville; and

Whereas the treaty thus negotiated in 1795, between General "Mad Anthony" Wayne and the Indians and signed by President George Washington and William Henry Harrison, aide de camp to General Wayne and later President of the United States, was one of the most important events in the life of our Nation; and

Whereas Greene Ville, named after General Wayne's Revolutionary compatriot, General Nathanael Greene, marked the headquarters from which General Wayne pressed on to victory over the Indians, caused the British to retire from Detroit and other lake points, and opened to peaceful invasion the entire territory north of the Ohio River and east of the Mississippi River, from which were formed the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, and Wisconsin; and

Whereas the pledge of security given by the treaty stimulated emigration to a remarkable degree and made possible the founding of such outstanding cities as Chicago, Cincinnati, Cleveland, Detroit, Fort Wayne, Indianapolis, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, and many other great cities; and

Whereas the victory is considered the most complete and most important ever gained over the Northwestern Indians during the 40 years' warfare it put to an end, and actually terminated the Revolutionary War; and

Whereas the Treaty of Greene Ville made possible the onrush of Americans into the great Northwest Territory, laying the foundation of the United States as a world power; and

Whereas there are now housed in the Public Library of Greenville, Ohio, hundreds of mementos and trophies of this critical period of American history which should be placed in a suitable memorial building in order to be preserved for future generations: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a Commission, to be known as the Greenville Memorial Commission, and to be composed of nine Commissioners, three to be appointed by the President of the United States, three Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House. Such Commission shall consider and formulate plans for designing and constructing a permanent memorial to and for designing and constructing a memorial building at Greenville, Ohio.

SEC. 2. Such Commission may, in its discretion, accept from any source, public or private, money or property to be used for the purpose of making surveys and investigations, formulating, preparing, and considering plans for the construction of such memorial, or other expenses incurred, or to be incurred, in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution.

SEC. 3. The Commission shall report its recommendations to Congress as soon as practicable.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000, which shall be available to defray the necessary expenses of the Commission for the performance of their duties hereinafter prescribed. Disbursement of sums herein authorized to be appropriated shall be made upon vouchers approved by the Chairman of the Commission.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 4, after the word "memorial", strike out "to and for designing and constructing a memorial."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DELAWARE TRIBE OF INDIANS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6535, authorizing an appropriation for payment to the Delaware Tribe of Indians on account of permanent annuities under treaty provision.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLCOTT]?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT TO SECTION 6, ORGANIC ACT OF ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4776, to amend section 6 of the Organic Act of Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 6 of the act entitled "An act to create a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska, to confer legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912 (37 Stat. 512), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 6. Convening and sessions of legislature: The Legislature of Alaska shall convene at the capitol at the city of Juneau, Alaska, on the fourth Monday in January in the year 1940 and on the fourth Monday in January in each year thereafter; but the said legislature shall not continue in session longer than 30 days in the year 1940 and in each even-numbered year thereafter and shall not continue in session longer than 60 days in the year 1941 and in each odd-numbered year thereafter unless again convened in extraordinary session by a proclamation of the Governor, which shall set forth the object thereof and give at least 15 days' notice in writing or by telegram or radiogram to each member of said legislature, and in such case shall not continue in session longer than 15 days. The Governor of Alaska is hereby authorized to convene the legislature in extraordinary session for a period not exceeding 15 days when requested to do so by the President of the United States or when any public danger or necessity may require it."

SEC. 2. Section 2 of the act entitled "An act fixing the date for holding elections of a Delegate from Alaska to the House of Representatives and of members of the Legislature of Alaska; fixing the date on which the Legislature of Alaska shall hereafter meet; prescribing the personnel of the Territorial canvassing board, defining its duties, and for other purposes," approved March 26, 1934 (48 Stat. 465), is repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "Legislature", strike out the balance of line 9 and all of lines 10 and 11, and lines 1 to 15 on page 2, and insert the following: "The Legislature of Alaska shall convene at the capitol at the city of Juneau, Alaska, on the fourth Monday in January in the year 1941 and on the fourth Monday in January every 2 years thereafter; but the said legislature shall not continue in session longer than 60 days in any 2 years unless again convened in extraordinary session by a proclamation of the Governor, which shall set forth the object thereof and give at least 15 days' notice in writing or by telegram or radiogram to each member of said legislature, and in such case shall not continue in session longer than 30 days. The Governor of Alaska is hereby authorized to convene the legislature in extraordinary session for a period not exceeding 30 days when requested to do so by the President of the United States, or when any public danger or necessity may require it."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF FUNDS TO WRANGELL, ALASKA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7612, for the transfer of funds to the town of Wrangell, Alaska.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the judge of the district court for the first judicial division of Alaska is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the city treasurer of the incorporated town of Wrangell, Alaska, from a fund called fund "C" of said district court, the sum of $6,092.76, heretofore paid into said fund "C" by the Diamond K Packing Co., a corporation of Wrangell, Alaska, in satisfaction of a judgment imposed upon said corporation by said court for nonpayment of license tax due the United States, in approximately the same sum, and by law inuring to the benefit of said town of Wrangell.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADOPTING LAWS OF STATES FOR PUNISHING WRONGFUL ACTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7018, to amend section 289 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 468) in regard to adopting laws of States for punishing wrongful acts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there some one present who can explain the effect of this bill?

Mr. CELLER. We have brought it down to February 1, to bring it up to date.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman state what part of the Federal law this applies to? Is this the section that adopts the State codes with regard to penalties for various crimes on Federal reservations, including Indian reservations?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This merely brings this up to date, accepting the State codes?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It simply brings the present law up to date; that is correct. It extends the time for the application of the law.

Mr. CELLER. We have passed these bills almost every session.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. This bill is merely a changing of the date at which the State codes are accepted?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is entirely correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I believe some of the rest of us are interested in what these bills amending the criminal code do. Will the gentleman explain the nature of the bill?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. This bill simply extends the effective date of the present law which makes applicable the provisions of the State act with respect to criminal offenses committed on a reservation which is surrounded by the State.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 289 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 468) be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 289. Whoever, within the territorial limits of any State, organized Territory, or district, but within or upon any of the places now existing or hereafter reserved or acquired, described in section 272 of the Criminal Code (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 451), shall do or omit the doing of any act or thing which is not made penal by any laws of Congress, but which if committed or omitted within the jurisdiction of the State, Territory, or district in which such place is situated, by the laws thereof in force on June 1, 1939, and remaining in force at the time of the doing or omitting the doing of such act or thing, would be penal, shall be deemed guilty of a like offense and be subject to a like punishment."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out "June 1, 1939," and insert "February 1, 1940."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PUNISHMENT FOR THE KILLING OR ASSAULTING OF FEDERAL OFFICERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7019, to amend section 1 of the act providing punishment for the killing or assaulting of Federal officers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FADDIS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to have this bill explained so we may know what it is.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The bill amends the existing law relating to the killing of certain Federal law-enforcement officers. The present act makes it a Federal offense to kill certain designated officers. Among these are United States marshals and deputy marshals and also special agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. The law is indefinite in that it is not quite certain whether it applies to the murder of a person who is employed to assist a United States marshal or deputy marshal or to a person who is an officer or an employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation but who may not be officially designated as a special agent of that Bureau. This bill simply expands the definition to make it certain that the law will apply to a person who is appointed by a marshal for the purpose of assisting him while, for instance, taking a prisoner to a Federal penitentiary.

Mr. FADDIS. Then it does not narrow the field any?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It expands it.

Mr. FADDIS. It does not provide any loopholes through which criminals may escape?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. No.

Mr. FADDIS. I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. COCHRAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does the present law take in the post-office inspectors and the employees of the Intelligence Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue who are constantly investigating dangerous characters?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes. The bill does not affect those in any way.

Mr. COCHRAN. Does existing law protect them?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman will see in the report that the bill substitutes the phrase "any officer or employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation" for the phrase "special agent of the Federal Bureau of Investigation" in the existing law.

Mr. COCHRAN. If you are going to take care of some Federal enforcement officers, why not take care of all of them? That is what I advocate.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I may say to the gentleman that the law now applies to post-office inspectors, Secret Service operatives, and similar officers. The bill simply provides that a person who is appointed to assist a United States marshal or deputy marshal is brought within the provisions of this act.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, does this measure also apply to every employee or appointee of the Federal Government?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the gentleman from Nebraska will permit me to answer, may I say to my friend from Colorado that the purpose of this proposed legislation is to bring within the protection of the Federal criminal provisions persons who are engaged by a marshal to help effectuate a particular arrest, or persons who are engaged, for instance, to help transport Federal prisoners from the place of conviction to the place of incarceration.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. It extends the act only to that extent?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is all that I know of.

Mr. KELLER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what does this bill do?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It gives such persons Federal protection and makes it a Federal offense to kill persons who are engaged in aiding in the transportation, for instance, of prisoners.

Mr. KELLER. It does not put them under civil service?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; it does not apply to deputy marshals; just persons hired for the job. It also applies to persons who may be called in to help a Federal marshal effect an arrest in a particular situation.

Mr. KELLER. That is all right.

Mr. FADDIS. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, would that include a chauffeur, a man driving a vehicle?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am not sure that that would be true.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It would be a question of construction. If that person were construed to be a person employed to assist a United States marshal or deputy United States marshal, it would. This bill is intended to cover into the provisions of the act individuals who are appointed or employed by a United States marshal or deputy marshal to assist in making an arrest or in dealing with prisoners.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 of the act of May 18, 1934 (ch. 299, 48 Stat. 780), as amended (U. S. C., title 18, sec. 253), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That whoever shall kill, as defined in sections 273 and 274 of the Criminal Code, any United States marshal or deputy United States marshal or person employed to assist a United States marshal or deputy United States marshal, any officer or employee of the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, post-office inspector, Secret Service operative, any officer or enlisted man of the Coast Guard, any employee of any United States penal or correctional institution, any officer, employee, agent, or other person in the service of the customs or of the internal revenue, any immigrant inspector or any immigration patrol inspector, any officer or employee of the Department of Agriculture designated by the Secretary of Agriculture to enforce any act of Congress for the protection, preservation, or restoration of game and other wild birds and animals, any officer or employee of the National Park Service, any officer or employee of, or assigned to duty in, the field service of the Division of Grazing of the Department of the Interior, or any officer or employee of the Indian field service of the United States, while engaged in the performance of his official duties, or on account of the performance of his official duties, shall be punished as provided under section 275 of the Criminal Code."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SERVICE OF PROCESS ON THE UNITED STATES IN FORECLOSURE ACTIONS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7020, to amend section 2 of the act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1528), in regard to service of process on the United States in foreclosure actions.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act of March 4, 1931 (46 Stat. 1528; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 902), be amended to read as follows:

"Service upon the United States shall be made by serving the process of the court with a copy of the bill of complaint upon the United States attorney for the district or division in which the suit has been or may be brought, or upon an assistant United States attorney or a clerical employee designated by the United States attorney in a writing filed with the clerk of the court in which suit is brought, and by sending copies of the process and bill, by registered mail, to the Attorney General of the United States at Washington, D. C. The United States shall have 60 days after service as above provided, or such further time as the court may allow, within which to appear and answer, plead, or demur."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSMISSION OF BUDGET IN YEARS IN WHICH A NEW PRESIDENT TAKES OFFICE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8307, to change the date of transmission to Congress of the Budget of the United States in years in which a new President takes office.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection a moment?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes, Mr. Speaker; I reserve it.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Speaker, under existing law, the President is required to transmit the Budget to Congress on the first day of each regular session thereof—section 201 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921.

As a matter of actual practice it never is sent in until the second or third day, depending upon the delivery of the annual message. The Budget usually follows the day after the annual message is delivered.

As the law now stands, Congress meets on January 3 of each year for the regular session.

The beginning of a Presidential term is on January 20.

With the transmission of the Budget required on the first day of the regular session, January 3, and a new President taking office on January 20, the situation arises of an outgoing President preparing completely and transmitting to Congress in accordance with and as required by law, a Budget for the fiscal year which begins July 1 next following the taking of office by a new President.

Under existing law, the outgoing President would prepare and transmit the Budget which would not go into effect until the new President had been in office for approximately 6 months.

This bill would permit the outgoing President, through the Bureau of the Budget and Federal agencies to proceed with the normal preparation of the Budget and advance the work as much as possible. It would prevent the transmission of the Budget to Congress. It would permit the incoming President to have until February 20, following his inauguration on January 20, to determine the kind of a Budget message he wished to incorporate in the Budget, and to determine the character of Budget he wished to present to Congress. A 30-day period should be sufficient to enable an incoming President to reach such conclusions and make such changes as he might desire in those items of the Budget which are not routine and which might be susceptible to changes based upon policy. The full 30 days might not be required and, in that event, the President could transmit his Budget earlier if he so desired.

A delay in the transmission of the Budget in any year until February would naturally delay the work of Congress in preparing the appropriation bills based upon that Budget; yet if the law is not changed, and the outgoing President sends in a Budget, and his successor taking office on January 20 differs with that Budget in policy or detail, and sends a modifying message to Congress remaking the Budget in essential particulars, there would be endless confusion and reconsideration with accompanying work of going over the ground again in the light of the new recommendations.

The bill would give a new President an opportunity to have something to say about the Budget for the first year of his new administration without the embarrassment of having to modify recommendations previously made by his predecessor for a period of Government during which the predecessor would not be President.

In years in which a President is inaugurated, the new Congress must be organized by the election of officers and the formation of committees. This often occupies considerable time, and the delay in the transmission of the Budget would not be entirely a loss of time under those circumstances.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I want to say to my highly distinguished friend from North Dakota, in whom I have great confidence and respect, that the prime object of this bill is to give the new or incoming Republican President an opportunity to pass upon the Budget, and I hope my Republican friend will not object.

Mr. BURDICK. In view of that promise I withdraw my objection, Mr. Speaker. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first paragraph of section 201 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, is amended to read as follows:

"The President shall transmit the Budget to Congress at each regular session thereof. The date of such transmission shall be not later than 5 days after the date of the convening of such session, except that the date of such transmission shall be not earlier than January 21, nor later than February 20, in a year in which the term of office of President of the United States begins, if the person whose term as incumbent of such office begins in such year is not the same person as the one whose term ends in such year. Each such Budget shall set forth in summary and detail:".

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TRANSFER OF LAND AT VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION FACILITY, COATESVILLE, PA.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2867, to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to transfer by quitclaim deed to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., for right-of-way purposes, a small strip of land at Veterans' Administration facility, Coatesville, Pa.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer by quitclaim deed to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. the following-described property located at Veterans' Administration facility, Coatesville, Chester County, Pa.:

Beginning at a point, said point being marked by an iron pin and set in the southwest corner of the Veterans' Administration Reservation as now constituted, said point also being in the northerly right-of-way line of the Pennsylvania Railroad right-of-way and fifty feet distant from the center thereof; said point also being directly opposite center line station 1972 plus 28.5 of the eastern region, Eastern Pennsylvania Division, Philadelphia Division of the Pennsylvania Railroad; thence north, no degrees fifty minutes no seconds west along the westerly boundary line of the Government Reservation, a distance of forty-two and forty one-hundredths feet to a point; thence along a curve to the left having a radius of five thousand six hundred and forty feet, a distance of six hundred and thirty-one and ninety-seven one-hundredths feet, the chord of which curve bears south seventy-four degrees thirty-four minutes six seconds east, a distance of six hundred and thirty-one and sixty-four one-hundredths feet; thence south thirty-four degrees fifty-one minutes and no seconds west along one of the boundary lines of the Government Reservation, a distance of forty-three and thirty-one one-hundredths feet to a point, said point being in the northerly right-of-way line of the Pennsylvania Railroad right-of-way and fifty feet distant from the center thereof, said point also being directly opposite center line station 1966 plus 17.55; thence along a curve to the right having a radius of five thousand six hundred and eighty feet, a distance of six hundred and five and sixty-five one-hundredths feet the chord of which curve bears north seventy-four degrees thirty-three minutes twenty seconds west, a distance of six hundred and five and thirty-six one-hundredths feet; said curve being the south boundary line of the Government Reservation and the north boundary line of the Pennsylvania Railroad right-of-way to the point of beginning, containing in all an area of five hundred and sixty-eight one-thousandths acres, more or less.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. This concludes the consideration of all bills eligible for call on the calendar today.

RELIEF OF INDIANS WHO HAVE PAID TAXES ON ALLOTTED LANDS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the proceedings by which the bill (H. R. 952) for the relief of Indians who have paid taxes on allotted lands for which patents in fee were issued without application by or consent of the allottees and subsequently canceled, and for the reimbursement of public subdivisions by whom judgments for such claims have been paid, was stricken from the calendar this morning, be vacated.

Mr. FADDIS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what bill is this?

Mr. CHURCH. The bill is H. R. 952.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I further reserve the right to object for the purpose of making an explanation. This is the bill which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] asked to have go over without prejudice. The gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. BURDICK] objected to that request, whereupon there were three objections to the consideration of the bill through some misunderstanding. I have spoken to the gentleman from Missouri and also to the gentleman from North Dakota and it is agreeable to them that the bill be restored to the calendar and then be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHURCH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 952) be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

SALE OF CERTAIN UNITED STATES LINES SHIPS TO A BELGIUM COMPANY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, the sale and transfer of eight ships belonging to the United States Lines, including the President Harding, to a Belgium company on an exceedingly thin mortgage is a shocking violation of the letter and spirit of the American Neutrality Act.

The United States Lines chartered the ships, worth $4,000,000, on a bare-boat charter, without any American crew for a down payment of only $137,000. This means that the United States Lines has a first mortgage of 97 percent in these boats. What a farce and travesty of our neutrality, when an American company can continue to own 97-percent interest in the ships.

The approval of the United States Maritime Commission of this sale and transfer of American ships to a Belgium company for operation between New York, England, France, and Belgium is an outrageous subterfuge and breach of our neutrality. This transfer is far worse than the administration's previous attempt to turn these ships over to the Panamanian flag.

The fight in the Congress centered on keeping American ships out of belligerent areas, and now an arm of the Government proposes to send ships in which American companies have a major interest into the war zone.

The minute we turn our ships over to carry arms and ammunition to belligerent nations we must expect reprisals and direct attacks from submarines and raiders off our coast.

This transfer is a reckless disregard of the intent of Congress in the Neutrality Act, which had for its main purpose keeping American ships out of the war zones and ourselves out of war. The next step will be to fly American flags over these 97 percent American-owned ships.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a statement by the Commissioner of Reclamation as to the Grand Coulee Dam. Also, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include a statement by the Geological Survey showing the stream flow during the last year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF LAND, TURTLE MOUNTAIN INDIAN AGENCY

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 1036) to authorize the purchase of certain lands adjacent to the Turtle Mountain Indian Agency in the State of North Dakota, with House amendments thereto, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed the following conferees: Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma, Mr. HILL, Mr. BURDICK.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include an editorial from the Sioux Falls Daily Argus Leader.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 407, to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that I may insert in my remarks certain newspaper articles to which I shall refer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the time for general debate has already been fixed by unanimous consent. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 407.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Joint Resolution 407, with Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 407

Resolved, etc., That the period during which the President is authorized to enter into foreign-trade agreements under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended by the act (Public, No. 316, 73d Cong.) approved June 12, 1934, is hereby extended for a further period of 3 years from June 12, 1940.

The CHAIRMAN. Under consent order of February 14 the time for general debate is fixed at 12 hours, the time to be equally divided between the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER].

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, since January 11 the Committee on Ways and Means has been giving continuous and careful consideration to House Joint Resolution 407, a resolution to extend the Trade Agreements Act, which is now before the House for consideration. That measure was first enacted in June of 1934, to be effective for a period of 3 years. In 1937 it was extended for an additional 3-year period, which will expire on June 12, 1940. At the time of its original enactment, and even, to some extent, upon the occasion of its extension in 1937, we were proceeding principally upon the basis of a strong hope and conviction that the reciprocal-trade program was the best means of curing the multitude of evils which had arisen under the Hawley-Smoot Act. We then dealt with hopes and beliefs; we now deal with concrete realities and factual evidence.

The Trade Agreements Act has been in operation almost 6 years, and there need be no further conjecture regarding its merits. There are sufficient facts before us to convince anyone who will give them unbiased and nonpartisan consideration of the virtues and success of the program. Very few public statutes or issues in the entire history of our Nation have been subjected to such widespread and critical examination. Through every channel of publication, the facts concerning this program have been placed before the American people, and its merits have been discussed and argued by almost every commentator on public affairs.

NEEDS FOR THE RECIPROCAL-TRADE PROGRAM

At the time of its enactment the Trade Agreements Act was not only the choice of all of the possible courses of action with respect to the tariff, but it was the only one having the elements necessary to success. Its adoption was a dire necessity if we were to stem the tide of calamity which was sweeping in upon us.

The Hawley-Smoot Tariff was enacted in June of 1930. However, the Congress began its consideration at a special session in April of 1929, called, ostensibly, for the purpose of a limited revision of the tariff to aid agriculture. It immediately became apparent that it was not to be a limited revision but an old-fashioned, logrolling tariff in the traditional Republican manner. Even Mark Sullivan describes this procedure as the typical Republican way. Not only this Nation, but the whole world saw what was coming. There immediately flocked to Washington a multitude of emissaries from the organized special interests. The representatives of each industry or interest had their pet object which must be protected at all costs. Logrolling, horse trading, and back scratching flourished as the contending factions maneuvered for position.

The best possible government is one whose primary consideration is the best interest and general welfare of its people as a whole. However, it is notorious that, in the consideration of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act, as in other Republican tariff legislation, an absolutely contrary course was followed. No group or interest, not ably represented at that grab fest, was given more than secondary or passing consideration, and, judged by their actions, nothing could have been further from the minds of its sponsors than the general welfare of all the American people. Some of the most favored of the benefit grabbers actually attended the executive session of the Committee on Ways and Means, so I am reliably informed, while the Democratic members of the committee were excluded (read Hull's testimony). The experts and clerks of other favored groups were given desks in the committee rooms and became a part of the committee staff.

The connection between tariff benefits and service to the Republican Party was never stronger. Those who had responded most liberally when the campaign hat was passed had the loudest and most effective voices in the distribution of the pie.

Mr. Chairman, Hon. Cordell Hull, now Secretary of State, at that time was the ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means. He was not even permitted to sit in when the bill was under consideration in executive session. He was unable to find out what was in the bill until it had been already acted upon by the Republican members of the committee. That was the consideration given the minority members in the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley bill.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, in the consideration of the bill in the committee, as I recall, it was impossible except for Republican members of the committee to offer amendments.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They brought in a special rule to permit no amendments except those offered by the majority members of the committee. Still we hear our friends of the minority talk about star-chamber proceedings. That is mentioned in the minority report. Of all people who should never talk about secret or star-chamber proceedings, or steam-roller processes, our minority friends are the last that should ever utter a word in that regard.

Of the 10,681 lines in the Hawley-Smoot bill, only 82 were considered in the House. Of the 727 paragraphs included in the first and second sections of the bill, only 6 of them were read and considered. Of the 183 sections contained in the bill, only a small fraction of one of the sections was read and considered. There were only 4 pages of the 434 pages of the bill given any consideration. Of this procedure, Ragon, of Arkansas, a former member of the Ways and Means Committee, said:

> As a fitting climax to this legislative horseplay which characterized the conduct of this bill through its consideration by the House, the Clerk read, as a part of the meager consideration of this bill, paragraph 2 * * *.
> A paragraph dealing with the chemical schedule.

During the formulation and enactment of the Hawley-Smoot legislation storm warnings were flying from every direction. More than a thousand leading economists predicted with prophetic accuracy the results which followed. It was pointed out that the only possible fruit of such evilly conceived and ill-considered legislation would be a disastrous effect upon our trade relations with foreign nations and, consequently, upon our own economy. The spokesmen of the Democratic Party and many leaders among the Republicans protested with all of the vigor at their command.

Our Republican friends contended with all the fervor of their souls that the Smoot-Hawley Act had nothing whatever to do with the depression of 1930 and afterward.

For instance, Mr. William Allen White, of Emporia, Kans., and editor of the Emporia Gazette, states:

> One of the things that brought about the depression was the Smoot-Hawley bill. The Gazette said so at the top of its lungs before the Smoot-Hawley law was finally formulated, while it was passing, and after it had become a law. That tariff was an offense against economic stability not only in the United States but all over the world.

I have some testimony here by the minority leader, bearing on that same subject. Here is what the minority leader [Mr. MARTIN] said as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

> From 1930 on, world conditions continued to get progressively worse. No one recognized this fact more clearly than President Hoover and the Republican Members of the Congress. They saw that these world-trade barriers which restricted the intelligent flow of goods were causing the depression.

What produced those barriers but the Smoot-Hawley Act?

Messrs. Garver and Hansen, two of the leading economists of the country, spoke concerning this matter, as follows:

> The Tariff Act of 1930, agitated in 1928—

That is when the country began to get alarmed—> introduced in Congress in 1929 at the height of prosperity, and passed before the depression had become serious, intensified international difficulties. It gave the signal for the collapse of the tariff truce which had been prepared in Europe, and led to tariff retaliations in many countries.

That is what these disinterested authorities and able economists said on this subject:

They further stated:

> Under the impact of the depression, the fall in prices, and the break-down of the international gold standard, tariffs almost everywhere were raised and other forms of trade restrictions were adopted, including rigid limitation of imports by means of fixed quotas and vigorous governmental control over foreign exchange.

I might read also for the edification of my brethren of the minority what the Washington Daily News of Monday, June 16, 1930, had to say editorially in this regard:

> No one can explain away the disastrous effects of this suicidal legislation on American prosperity.
>
> Here are the facts as recorded on just 1 day: On the day the bill passed Wall Street responded with a market drop which dragged several standard stocks even lower than in the November crash.
>
> On the day the bill passed there was a general fall in commodity prices, bringing some to new low levels for the year.
> On the day the bill passed all grain prices fell to new levels for the season—wheat went to the lowest price in a year, oats the lowest in 8 years, rye the lowest in 30 years.
> On the day the bill passed the price of cotton declined to the lowest level in more than 3 years.

Our friends disclaim and deny any responsibility whatsoever for the depression, so far as the Smoot-Hawley Act is concerned. It is characteristic of our friends to always claim credit when the country is prosperous and conditions are favorable, but when the reverse is the case, they deny responsibility.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield to my friend.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Reminiscent of the passage of the bill and the figures quoted by the gentleman with reference to the fall on the stock market and agricultural prices, I recall quite vividly that the last argument made in favor of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was by our friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER], and his last words were that the sunshine of prosperity is now about to burst upon our great country in the passage of this great bill. I recall that I made the remark next day that the sunshine burst the wrong way, and it kept on bursting the wrong way continuously thereafter.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That was about the time that Mr. Hoover said that Republican policies would abolish poverty and that two cars would be in every garage and every pot would be filled with good fat chickens. That was about the same time as the remarks of the gentleman from New York, Dr. CROWTHER.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Not now. I do not have time.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Quoting further from the News:

> On the day the bill passed European dispatches reported that the copper interests of Great Britain, Belgium, and Germany had agreed to retaliate by withdrawing large orders in the United States for copper and nonferrous metals, whereupon the American Copper Exporters' Association frantically cut prices.

On the day the bill passed, the Mexican Government officially announced it would erect retaliatory duties, which follows similar retaliation against us by Canada and others.

Not only Mexico but also other nations announced retaliatory duties, which followed similar action by Canada and other nations.

On the day the bill passed, the United States Department of Commerce announced that American exports dropped in May to the lowest point in the last 6 years.

When the Smoot-Hawley Act was under consideration our Republican friends were so sure that it was a panacea for all our ills and would cure all of our economic difficulties that Senator Watson, of Indiana, in the Senate made this very definite statement:

It is quite true that we are in the midst of a financial depression produced by manifest causes that I shall not here discuss and which do not pertain to this subject, but I here and now predict, and I ask my fellow Senators to recall this prediction in the days to come, that if this bill is passed this Nation will be on the upgrade financially, economically, and commercially within 30 days, and that within a year from this time we shall have regained the peak of prosperity and the position we lost last October, and shall again resume our position as the first and foremost of all the people of history in all the essential elements of individual and national greatness.

EFFECTS OF THE HAWLEY-SMOOT ACT

The storm warnings were unheeded, the counsel of the economists ignored, and the protests were lightly turned aside. The effects of the legislation were even more calamitous than its critics had predicted.

Agriculture, the already desperate plight of which had served as the excuse for the Grundy orgy, sank to unbelievably lower depths. The farm cash income of the United States dropped down from 11.2 billions of dollars in 1929 to 4.7 billions in 1932. By 1932, farmers were getting 30 cents a bushel for their wheat, notwithstanding the wheat tariff of 42 cents a bushel. They were getting only 10 to 20 cents a bushel for corn, even though the corn tariff was 25 cents a bushel. In Kansas and other States corn was being used for fuel. They were getting only 15 or 16 cents a pound for their butterfat, although the tariff on butter was 14 cents a pound. They were getting only 9 cents a pound for their wool, even though the wool tariff was 24 cents a pound. Cotton was selling for about 5 cents a pound. Millions of farmers lost their homes.

In retaliation against the excessive rates provided, other countries set up barriers equal to or greater than our own. The result was a complete deadlock, resulting in a gradually increasing paralysis of international trade and commerce. Our sales to other nations fell from over 5 billion dollars in 1929 to a little more than 1½ billions in 1932. The ruinous effects of the closing of export outlets for the great surplus-producing divisions of both agriculture and industry rapidly permeated every branch of our economic life. The reduced purchasing power of their employees and owners was immediately reflected in the consumption of articles produced for domestic use. This vicious cycle grew in intensity until American business, industry, and agriculture found themselves in the midst of utter ruin.

It was a particularly ironic justice that caused those groups and interests, who had clamored for and secured special protection under the Hawley-Smoot Act, to suffer from its iniquitous effects just as did their fellow citizens who had not received favored treatment. They had pulled the house down on themselves.

DEMOCRATIC ACTION TO SAVE THE NATION FROM "GRUNDYISM"

The present administration met the problem squarely with bold and vigorous action. Many purely domestic measures were taken to restore employment, relieve suffering and distress, rebuild prices, increase wages and values, save our farms and homes from mortgage foreclosures, rescue our factories and business houses from bankruptcy, make our banks and financial institutions safe depositories of the people's money, and to restore transportation and to improve all phases of our national economic life.

It was evident, however, that such action alone could not insure a full and stable prosperity unless our foreign trade could be revived. The only way this could be achieved was to remove the strangling shackles which the Hawley-Smoot tariff had wound about our commerce with other nations. Intelligent observers pointed out that unless we could see our national economy as a whole and could view national prosperity as a unit, we could never hope to place this Nation upon a permanently secure economic basis.

The basic philosophy which activated the Congress in the adoption of the Trade Agreements Act was founded in a realization that exports and imports are interdependent, and that nations, like individuals, cannot sell unless they buy. We knew that it would prove impossible to persuade other nations to modify their trade restrictions toward us, imposed to counteract the restrictions which we had raised against them, unless we stood ready to adjust our own trade barriers and correct our own mistakes. With international economic relationships so filled with swiftly changing complexities in which other governments have the means of speedy action, we believed it necessary for the legislative and executive branches of our Government to cooperate in providing the proper means of meeting these emergencies with action equally swift.

By the Reciprocal Trade Act the Congress placed in the hands of the Executive the authority and responsibility of administering this program, after first defining the policy to be followed, the limitations and restraints beyond which the powers granted do not extend, and the methods by which the purposes of the act are to be carried out. We believed and still believe, and the facts fully support our contention, that the program adopted was the best way to deal with the vexatious problem; and that it supplies the safest, surest, simplest, and only practical method of rebuilding our foreign trade on a secure basis.

SAFEGUARDS IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF THE PROGRAM

The Congress exercised the utmost caution, consistent with the speed and efficacy necessary to the success of the program, by surrounding the administration of the Trade Agreements Act with every possible safeguard. Under the provisions of the statute no agreement can be entered into until after due public notice shall have been given and all interested persons have had an opportunity to be heard and to present their views.

Moreover, section 4 of the Trade Agreements Act provides that before concluding any agreement "the President shall seek information and advice with respect thereto from the United States Tariff Commission, the Departments of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, and from such other sources as he may deem appropriate."

Pursuant to this provision an interdepartmental organization has been established on which five agencies are regularly represented, namely, the Departments of State, Agriculture, Commerce, and Treasury, and the United States Tariff Commission. Through this organization the agencies mentioned participate in the formulation of every detail of the trade agreements and no agreement has been entered into which has not been fully concurred in by them. In addition, a number of other departments and agencies are consulted with respect to special questions coming within their field and their information and views have been brought to bear upon the questions presented.

I am assured by the heads of the departments concerned that this organization and this procedure will be fully maintained with respect to any action taken under this authority in the future, not only as regards the question of concluding particular agreements but as regards the joint participation in the formulation of their terms down to the minutest detail.

This procedure and administration is in accordance with the intention of Congress when the existing statute was enacted. I desire to state that I urge the renewal of this act with that fact in mind.

In other words the State Department, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Agriculture, and the United States Tariff Commission all cooperated in working out and negotiating these trade agreements. I was informed today by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce as well as the Department of State that they have all cooperated 100 percent and that they have worked unitedly, that there has been no disagreement, that they have been in entire accord as to all of these agreements which have been negotiated. Is not this sufficient assurance that the purposes of the bill have been carried out, and likewise assurance that proper and necessary safeguards were thrown about the program?

There is also an Interdepartmental Trade Agreements Committee, made up of representatives of the departments and agencies of the Government, which directs all necessary studies, reviews the reports and recommendations of its subcommittees, and approves all details of the agreements subject to final approval by the Secretary of State and the President. Each agreement is further protected by an escape clause.

I am reliably informed that not only are the Department of State, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of Commerce, and the Tariff Commission cooperating, but that also they call in the heads of other Departments and Bureaus and get advice from them, and secure the best information possible before these agreements are concurred in. Oh, the minority report says that notwithstanding they give hearings to all interested parties, hearings should be granted after the agreements are negotiated, after they are prepared and perfected. Think how perfectly ridiculous such a proposition is. It is just like saying that they should give hearings on a tariff bill after the committee has brought in its recommendation. They know that such a thing was never done. They know that such a policy would vitiate any program adopted. They know that no one could ever do anything like that. That is so asinine and so absolutely ridiculous that I am surprised that the minority representatives should suggest it. There would never be any end to negotiations.

Each agreement is further protected by an escape clause. I have a letter here from Secretary Hull on that subject amplifying his position and will place that in the RECORD:

FEBRUARY 8, 1940.

The Honorable ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, Ways and Means Committee,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. DOUGHTON: Replying to your inquiry relative to the escape or safeguarding clauses included in trade agreements and the policy of the Executive branch of the Government in putting them into operation, with special reference to the trade agreement with Venezuela, I would say that, in accordance with the general policy of providing flexibility in order to safeguard the interests of our domestic producers, an escape or safeguarding clause in unusually broad terms was included in the trade agreement with Venezuela. This clause permits remedial action whenever—to use the language of the agreement—"special circumstances" render it necessary or advisable to do so. The clause would permit such action with respect to petroleum or any other product included in the agreement.

I scarcely need to assure you that the operation of the trade agreements is given constant and careful supervision in order that remedial action may be taken whenever it appears that the producer of any product might be materially injured. Nor is it necessary to add that this statement applies to the concessions granted on petroleum and other products included in the Venezuelan agreement.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

Secretary Hull definitely and plainly states that, through the escape clause, if any mistakes are made, the injured party may have a hearing to show wherein he is injured. Through this escape clause any injurious effect of the trade agreements is remedied.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am glad to yield to my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. I call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the fact that the late President McKinley, despite the efforts of our Republican friends to place a different construction upon what he said in the last speech he made before he was unfortunately assassinated, made the strongest appeal for reciprocal-trade agreements that I have ever heard expresed by anyone. In fact, his suggestions were nearly along the lines of the present law.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Absolutely. You could lay the statement of President McKinley alongside the words of Secretary Hull and hardly distinguish between them.

Here is what President McKinley said in his last speech:

We have a vast and intricate business, built up through years of toil and struggle, in which every part of the country has its stake, which will not permit of either neglect or of undue selfishness. No narrow, sordid policy will subserve it. The greatest skill and wisdom on the part of the manufacturers and producers will be required to hold and increase it. Our industrial enterprises, which have grown to such great proportions, affect the homes and occupations of the people and the welfare of the country. Our capacity to produce has developed so enormously and our products have so multiplied that the problem of our markets requires our urgent and immediate attention. Only a broad and enlightened policy will keep what we have. No other policy will get more. In these times of marvelous business energy and gain we ought to be looking to the future, strengthening the weak places in our industrial and commercial systems, that we may be ready for any storm or strain.

By sensible trade arrangements, which will not interrupt our home production, we shall extend the outlets for our increasing surplus. A system which provides a mutual exchange of commodities is manifestly essential to the continued and healthful growth of our export trade. We must not repose in fancied security that we can forever sell everything and buy little or nothing. If such a thing were possible, it would not be best for us or for those with whom we deal. We should take from our customers such of their products as we can use without harm to our industries and labor. Reciprocity is the natural outgrowth of our wonderful industrial development under the domestic policy now firmly established. What we produce beyond our domestic consumption must have a vent abroad. The excess must be relieved through a foreign outlet, and we should sell everywhere we can and buy wherever the buying will enlarge our sales and production, and thereby make a greater demand for home labor.

The period of exclusiveness is past. The expansion of our trade and commerce is the pressing problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations will prevent reprisals. Reciprocity treaties are in harmony with the spirit of the times; measures of retaliation are not.

If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should they not be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

Had I not known by whom that statement was made I would have thought it came from Secretary Hull on the subject of reciprocity.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I make another inquiry? Has my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, any observations to make on the unfortunate situation that arose in the committee where the Republican members undertook to make this a political issue?

Mr. DOUGHTON. It was very unfortunate that a great economic question like this should be made a political issue; but from the very beginning of our hearings, at every turn, every day, every opportunity, it was perfectly manifest they were making political capital out of this question.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Will not the gentleman admit that the tariff has been a political issue in this country from the very foundation of our Government?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; but I will not admit it should be. Of course, it is an issue upon which the Republican Party has depended for its life and vitality. If you were to take that issue from it, I do not know on what source they would rely for campaign funds, and without campaign funds I do not know where it would be. It gives them a source of revenue to conduct their campaigns, and that is the cause of the desperate opposition to this legislation.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Does not the gentleman know his own party endorsed the Republican Party policy with reference to the protective tariff, and does not the gentleman know every man on the Democratic side of the Committee on Ways and Means——

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not yield for a speech from the gentleman. I do not know that the Democratic Party has ever taken that position, and I hope it will never endorse everything that the Republican Party stands for in the way of a tariff. I would feel like quitting the Democratic Party if it committed a sin of that kind.

Mr. GEARHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GEARHART. I hope the Democratic Party never does fall as low as the gentleman pointed out, but likewise the gentleman rose to great heights when he referred to President McKinley. But whether the question of the tariff is a political one or not, I want the gentleman to know exactly what President McKinley did stand for, and with his permission may I read at this moment about three lines from what the former President had to say on this subject?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot yield for a stump speech. The gentleman can use his own time.

Mr. GEARHART. I want to read a line or two.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I cannot yield. The gentleman can do that in his own time.

Mr. GEARHART. The gentleman quoted what President McKinley said.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not yield to the gentleman. The gentleman took more time to make stump speeches in committee than any other member. I decline to yield at this time for a political stump speech.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COOPER. The statement to which the gentleman from California refers is in the minority report, which is available to all Members.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Of course it is there, and it will be distorted in every possible way in order to make capital out of it.

RESULTS OF THE PROGRAM

By inaugurating the trade-agreements program, under our great Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, we took a position of leadership in a movement to reverse the destructive trends of trade-destroying impediments and to open the way for a healthy expansion of mutually beneficial trade between our country and the rest of the world. Trade agreements have been concluded with 21 nations, including such important commercial countries as the United Kingdom and Canada, our 2 best customers. These agreements include 8 with European countries: namely Belgium, Sweden, the Netherlands, Switzerland, France, Finland, the United Kingdom, and Czechoslovakia, which has been terminated. One agreement has been concluded with Turkey, a near-eastern country, and, in the Western Hemisphere, the original agreement with Canada, effective on January 1, 1936, has been superseded by a new agreement, effective on January 1, 1939. Eleven agreements have been concluded with the following American republics: Cuba, Haiti, Brazil, Honduras, Colombia, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Ecuador, and Venezuela. One agreement, that with Cuba, became effective in 1934, 3 in 1935, 10 in 1936, 2 in 1937, 2 in 1938, and 3 in 1939.

Let us take notice of the effect of the reciprocal-trade agreements. The way to judge anything is by its effect, not what its opponents or proponents may say about it.

In 1929, our exports to those countries with which we now have trade agreements aggregated about $3,000,000,000. By 1933, sales to these countries had sunk to less than $1,000,000,000. In 1938, they had risen again to more than $2,000,000,000. Trade with these countries constitutes about 60 percent of our total foreign trade.

In the trade agreements thus far concluded with 21 countries, the foreign governments concerned have lowered their trade barriers on a wide range of American farm and factory products. The concessions obtained by the United States include duty reductions, enlarged quotas, and other mitigations of restrictive measures, as well as the binding of existing duties or free entry, on literally hundreds of items which enter into our export trade. Opponents of a liberal trade policy try to tell us that the concessions which we have obtained are of no benefit while those which we have granted are injurious.

They produced no evidence in support of the contention. That is the only statement that was made, but it is not supported by the facts. When you compare our trade with the countries with which we have negotiated trade agreements, with those countries with which we have no trade agreements, it will be shown conclusively the benefits that have flown from the enactment of these agreements.

Taking the years 1934 and 1935 as substantially a pre-agreement period, since only one agreement was in effect for the entire year of 1935, exports from the United States averaged two and two-tenths billion dollars. During the 2-year period 1937 and 1938, with 17 agreements in effect for most of the time, exports had increased to an average of three and two-tenths billion dollars.

That is an increase of $1,000,000,000 over the period before the agreements were entered into. We do not make exaggerated claims, or claims that cannot be supported by the facts.

While no claim is made that this entire trade increase was due to the advantages for American exports obtained by the United States in trade agreements, it is significant that during the period 1937–38, exports from the United States to countries with which reciprocal-trade agreements were in operation averaged 61.2 percent greater than during the 1934–35 period. Over the same periods, our exports to non-trade-agreement countries averaged only 37.9 percent greater.

INCREASED IMPORTS AND EXPORTS

A comparison of the average imports and exports with respect to both the trade-agreement and nonagreement countries for the years 1934 and 1935, as against those for the years 1937 and 1938, show the following results: For 1934–35, the yearly average of exports to the trade-agreement countries was $760,000,000. For 1937–38, this figure had risen to one billion two hundred and twenty-five millions, an increase of four hundred and sixty-five millions, or 61 percent. At the same time, our average imports from these same countries increased from $794,000,000 to 1934–35 to one billion seventy-four millions in 1937–38, an increase of two hundred and eighty millions or only 35 percent, as compared with the 61-percent increase in exports. This shows we were not outtraded in these agreements.

Using a like comparison regarding our trade with nonagreement countries, exports increased from one billion four hundred and forty-eight millions to one billion nine hundred and ninety-seven millions, an increase of five hundred and forty-nine millions, or 38 percent as compared to the 61-percent increase in the case of the trade-agreement countries. On the same basis, imports from the nonagreement countries increased from one billion fifty-seven millions to one billion four hundred and forty-eight millions, an increase of three hundred and ninety-one millions, or 37 percent.

Thus, in the case of the trade-agreement countries, exports have increased 61 percent while imports have increased 35 percent; while in the case of the nonagreement countries, imports and exports have increased in almost exactly the same proportion.

In this respect, Roger Babson, noted statistician, in an article appearing last Monday in the Washington Post, states:

> This, in a nutshell tells the effectiveness of the program, its aid to jobs and industry.

And, in closing his article, he further states:

> As statistician, I believe that the Hull trade pacts should be backed to the limit by every straight-thinking, unselfish, and honest American.

It is important to note not only that exports from the United States to the trade-agreements countries have gained relatively more than exports to non-trade-agreement countries, but also that the trade-agreement countries have generally increased their purchases of American products more than they have increased their purchases of the products of other countries. For example, in 1937 and 1938, Belgian imports for consumption from the United States were 81 percent and 100 percent, respectively, above imports during the pre-agreement year, 1934, while Belgian imports from all other countries were only 44 percent and 14 percent greater. In the 3 years 1936–38 of the first agreement with Canada, that country's imports from the United States averaged 42 percent greater than in 1934–35 as compared with an average gain of 22 percent in Canadian imports from countries other than the United States between the same periods.

BENEFITS TO AGRICULTURE

The benefits which American agriculture has derived from the operation of the trade-agreements program are substantial. The volume of agricultural commodities imported from trade-agreement countries has not increased to any greater degree than the volume of such imports from nonagreement countries. On the other hand, farm exports to the trade-agreements countries have increased 15 percent from 1935–36 to 1938–39, while exports to nonagreement countries have actually decreased 19 percent.

Valuable and substantial concessions have been secured from many foreign countries regarding our basic farm products such as corn, hogs, wheat, fruits, tobacco, lard, and many other items. Under this treatment, farm income rose from four and seven-tenths billions of dollars in 1932 to seven and six-tenths billions in 1938.

The increased consuming power of the industrial worker and city dweller, due to the beneficial effects of this program, has aided substantially in the improvement of the farmer's domestic market. In addition, allowing for the changes in the cost of living to the farmer, the farm income of 1938 represented at least 40 percent more purchasing power than such income for 1932.

These are substantial, concrete facts and not opinions, about which there can be no controversy. They stand as an insurmountable wall to those critics of the program who would have us abandon it and revert once more to particular protection of the special interest.

There was no evidence of any direct or serious injury. Those opposed to the program based their opposition on fear of what might occur. We vigorously contend that even if some slight direct injury has been sustained, it is more than compensated for by generally improved business throughout the country.

Even if some slight temporary hardship does result to some particular industry or minor group or interest, it is apparent that, in the long run, benefits will flow to every citizen through the improved national economy and general welfare of the country. We are not here dealing with local legislation which is aimed solely to the benefit of any section or group. Here we have national legislation in its broadest sense, with the welfare of the whole United States as its supreme goal.

MOST-FAVORED-NATION CLAUSE

I want to comment briefly upon the policy of equal treatment. Now, we have paid our Republican friends a great compliment by adopting the most-favored-nation policy from them. In some ways they do not seem to appreciate this compliment.

The increases in our exports to trade-agreement countries occurred not only because we obtained from such countries valuable tariff reductions and important mitigations of other restrictive measures but also because, through trade agreements, they have given us a guaranty of equal treatment. These assurances of nondiscrimination against our goods were secured through the application of the unconditional most-favored-nation principle.

For example, in the agreement with Canada, reductions due to a most-favored-nation treatment were obtained on some 600 items, covering $112,000,000, including a long list of grains and their products, iron and steel manufactures, and heavy machinery.

There has been a good deal said to the effect that countries with which we have trade agreements continue to discriminate against us. No evidence was presented to prove the statements. A list of countries was presented by one witness, but I was interested to note that the countries had not concluded trade agreements under the present act. Through trade agreements we have an effective instrument for maintaining a nondiscriminatory principle. We have not had an effective instrument outside of trade agreements.

Obviously, when we demand and receive nondiscriminatory treatment from other countries, we must be willing to extend similar treatment to them. It is necessary insurance against one of the most injurious obstructions to trade to which our exports are exposed. Hence the Congress, in passing the Trade Agreements Act, wisely decided to continue nondiscriminatory treatment as the basis of our commercial policy. Accordingly the unconditional most-favored-nation principle—the only effective means of insuring nondiscriminatory treatment for exports—which has been employed in this country since 1923, has been embodied in our trade agreements.

We have generalized the tariff adjustments made in individual trade agreements to all countries which have been found to accord us substantially nondiscriminatory treatment. We have refused such generalization to countries which in turn refuse us such treatment. In this manner our most-favored-nation policy has been a means not only of improving our trade with the trade-agreement countries, but also a valuable instrument for safeguarding our trade position in other countries. The records of our recent hearings show that the advantages to us under this principle have been 8 or 9 to 1. That certainly, by no stretch of the imagination, can be considered a Santa Claus policy. This policy is followed because it is good business.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. The gentleman has noted in the minority report the statement that the exports were already on the increase at the time the trade-treaty program began. Is it not a fact that as a result of the Republican high-tariff, depression-creating policy our exports had reached such a low level in 1932 that any increase would have been a large gain?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Why, of course. There is no question about that. It had reached a death level.

Mr. BUCK. Is it not a fact that actually exports increased by $64,000,000 in 1933 over 1932 and by $522,000,000 in 1934 over 1933; so that there was a tremendous increase after the trade-agreement program went into effect?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes. If you do not manipulate the figures and state the facts just as they are, there is no question about that.

Mr. BUCK. In 1935 the exports were $150,000,000 greater than in 1934; in 1936, $323,000,000 above 1934; in 1937, $1,216,000,000 above 1934, an average of $739,000,000 every year from 1934 through to the year 1939.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I regret I do not have the time to yield now. I might yield for a brief question. I want to be fair.

Mr. MOTT. Suppose I ask a question, then. What was the value of our exports last year?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Does the gentleman mean our exports for 1939 to non-trade-agreement countries?

Mr. MOTT. No; the total amount, our total exports.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know whether I have that figure right here. I can get it and put it in the RECORD; my recollection is our exports were $3,177,000,000.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Has any expert opinion been vouchsafed as to what percentage of these increases is attributable to our reciprocal-trade agreements?

Mr. DOUGHTON. There might be a difference of opinion about that, but when we show that the increase to countries with which we have the agreements is much larger than the increase to the countries with which we do not have trade agreements, it is a logical and reasonable conclusion that the greater increase to the countries with which we do have agreements is attributable to the agreements.

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Particularly in view of the fact that there is no other chief reason for the increase?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know of any other. I do not believe you can study the facts and reach any other reasonable conclusion.

Mr. COOPER. If the gentleman will yield, I believe I have the figures here.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman does not have the figures, I may say that I have the figures for the first 11 months of 1939.

Mr. COOPER. The total exports of the United States for 1939 were $3,136,000,000, or an increase of 42 percent over the pre-trade-agreement years 1934 and 1935.

Mr. MOTT. They increased only a fraction of a percent over 1929?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a stump speech. I do not have the time. The gentleman will get time from his side to make his speech.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman misunderstands; I was asking a question. I say that is an increase of only a fraction of 1 percent over the exports for 1929.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman can make his own calculation.

Mr. MOTT. I am asking the gentleman.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman will not dispute the fact that there has been an increase over——

Mr. MOTT. Over 1929? I do dispute it.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Since the trade agreements over the prior years.

Mr. MOTT. Over the depression years of 1931 and 1932, certainly, but not over the year 1929, when there was no depression. The figures show that our exports now are no greater than they were then.

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman does not deny the fact that there has been a decided improvement over the years when the Hawley-Smoot Act was in effect. There is no denial. The facts will not support a denial.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to read a telegram that should have gone in the hearings but was not received until after the hearings were closed. This is from Clarence Poe, editor of the Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist, an agricultural paper that has as wide a circulation as any farm paper in the United States. He is not a politican, and he is not trying to make any political capital of this or to deceive anyone. He has made as thorough and careful a study of this subject from the standpoint of the interest of agriculture as any man, perhaps, in the entire country.

The telegram reads as follows:

RALEIGH, N. C., February 15, 1940.

Hon. R. L. DOUGHTON,
Chairman, House Committee on Ways and Means:

I earnestly hope you and your committee will do everything in your power to secure an extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. I believe present world conditions make it imperative that America follow this procedure in order to restore international trade and that the labors of a man so able, patriotic, and well informed as Cordell Hull will result in gains to American agriculture far offsetting some incidental losses. As a past master of the North Carolina State Grange I especially regret what I believe the mistaken attitude of Mr. TABER on this issue. Since I find it impossible to reach Washington at this time I shall be glad if you will read to your committee this statement, which am confident is for the best interests of the 950,000 southern farmers who read our magazine.

CLARENCE POE,
President and Editor, Progressive Farmer and Southern Ruralist.

Also a telegram from Mr. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT L. DOUGHTON,
Washington, D. C.:

The last American Farm Bureau Federation convention, representing farmers in 39 States, endorsed without a dissenting vote continuance of reciprocal-trade agreements. All agreements to be approved by Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture. We respectfully urge your support of House Joint Resolution 407.

EDW. A. O'NEAL,
President, American Farm Bureau Federation.

The benefits which American agriculture have derived from the operation of the American trade-agreement program are substantial. I am trying to give the gentleman some information about the effect on agriculture now. The volume of agricultural commodities imported from countries with which we have negotiated trade agreements has not increased to any greater degree than the volume of such imports from nonagreement countries, which are affected only by the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. On the other hand, farm exports to trade-agreement countries have increased 15 percent from 1935–36 to 1938–39, while exports to non-trade-agreement countries have actually decreased 19 percent. In other words, we have increased our exports of farm commodities to countries with which we have had trade agreements and have lost in exports to countries with which we have not had trade agreements. I am sure this cannot be challenged.

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MURRAY. Does that include the Canadian treaty or is that the general figure?

Mr. DOUGHTON. This has reference to all the treaties with respect to farm commodities.

Valuable and substantial concessions have been secured from many foreign countries regarding our basic farm products, such as corn. We have an exportable surplus of corn. We have secured concessions on corn, hogs, wheat, fruit, tobacco, lard, and many other items for which we must have an export market if we are to secure anything like living prices for these farm commodities. Cattle is about the only farm commodity that is above parity. How much further below parity would these farm commodities be were it not for our export trade which has been vitally and effectively stimulated by these trade agreements? Under this treatment farm income rose from $4,700,000,000 in 1932 to $7,600,000,000 in 1938.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I will yield for a question to my colleague and friend on the committee. I do not yield for any statistics, because you can prove or disprove anything by statistics if they are manipulated.

When our exports of industrial commodities are increased or stimulated, that gives better prices for farm commodities at home, because the more people who work in industries, whether for domestic consumption or for exports, that provides a better market for the consumption of farm commodities.

There was no evidence of any direct or any serious injury to any agricultural interests.

Those who oppose the program base their opposition on fear of what might happen. Of course, you could have fears about any subject and never move in any direction. If we are always looking for a ghost we would never make any progress, because in any kind of legislation there is more or less risk or uncertainty and the success of any program can only be determined by its administration and its effects or results.

We seriously contend that even if any slight or indirect injury has been sustained, this is more than compensated by the general improved conditions throughout the country brought about by the Trade Agreements Act. More than that, let me repeat that in the administration of this law, the Secretary of State, whose judgment, ability, experience, and patriotism cannot be questioned, has assured us that every possible safeguard is thrown around the domestic producer in order to protect him from any serious injury under the escape clause provided in these agreements, and in case injury is shown, prompt and effective action will be taken as stated in Secretary Hull's letter which I have already placed in the RECORD, in order to remove the danger of any injury that might come to any domestic industry. I do not know what more could be expected.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARLSON. The gentleman has on at least two occasions mentioned the escape clause with which we are all familiar.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. CARLSON. It is a fact, is it not, that it has not been used at any time?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know that there has been any special necessity for it being used, because no case of injury has been shown, but we are assured it will be used if necessary or if there is any occasion for it. I cannot yield for a speech to my friend, who is an able member of our committee, because I want to conclude my remarks, but I will yield for a question.

Mr. CARLSON. Does not the gentleman think that the zinc producers of the United States produced a pretty good case of injury?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not think so, because of the fact it was shown, I think, by conclusive evidence they were in a very, very prosperous condition. So I do not see how any great injury can occur to an industry when it is very prosperous. Perhaps they expect too much.

Here is something that ought to be of interest to the American people. They are intelligent and they are following these questions carefully. No question has been more thoroughly debated nor is better understood by the people than the question of trade agreements. Dr. George Gallup recently conducted a poll, shown in the Washington Post, and that poll shows that 71 percent of the people of the United States favor the reciprocal-tariff program. The poll further shows that the ratio or percentage of Republicans and Democrats that favor this program are about the same.

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SANDAGER. What percentage of the people had no knowledge of the trade agreements?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, if the gentleman wants to question the knowledge of the people of the United States, he can do it. I would not want to do that. I do not think the gentleman can afford to do that, and I think the gentleman would want to take that out of the RECORD—any statement to the effect that our people are not intelligent. Seventy-one percent are for the reciprocal-trade program, the poll shows. Then there was a nonpartisan poll taken by the Economic Policy Committee, composed of outstanding economists from various universities. They polled the leading economists of the Nation regarding their reaction to the reciprocal-trade program, and out of 552 leading economists, replies favoring the program were received from 550. Every poll taken shows the same trend. A survey of the national press of the country, irrespective of party, was taken, and that shows that 82 percent of our newspapers—Republican and Democrat—favor reciprocal-trade agreements and only 9 oppose it. The others are noncommital. That is 82 to 9—a little more than 9 to 1. I think that that would be occasion for thought on the part of some of my friends before they go before the country and make this a political issue.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I am sorry I cannot yield, as I have not time.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman is mistaken so far as one newspaper that I know of is concerned, anyway.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Oh, one out of a thousand. What does that mean? If I could not name more than one, I would say nothing.

I shall read now a brief editorial which I think is very pertinent, and which appeared yesterday, February 18, 1940, in the Baltimore Sun. That editorial reads as follows:

DEBATING POINTS AGAINST THE HULL PROGRAM

We have not had access to the complete text of the report of the Republican minority of the Ways and Means Committee on the trade agreements bill, but to judge by the rather full accounts of this document in the Washington dispatches, it is in the best tradition of the high school debating societies. The Republican critics of the Hull program show no grasp of fundamentals. On the contrary, they seem to have been content to make "points" against the reciprocal-trade agreements wherever points could be found, without reference to any coherent and consistent theory of their own.

A prime example of the debating-society technique is the argument that the trade agreements have not prevented the outbreak of the European war. Minority members of the committee made much of this argument during the hearings. It was and is their only answer to the insistence of the proponents of the trade agreements that no solid organization of world peace would be possible except under a system providing for mutually profitable exchanges of goods and services between nations in a free market and that the trade-agreements program affords the best American approach to such a system. To undertake to belittle this fundamental truth by harping on the fact that the European war has broken out since the trade-agreements program was initiated is to pit juvenility against statesmanship.

All the other debating points against the Hull program find a place in the minority report. That document includes even a proposal for a substitute program, which suggests that perhaps those who attack and belittle the trade agreements have a glimmer of perception that something along the lines of the present policy is needed in the modern world. But the Republicans do not undertake to outline their substitute. That would not be in accord with debating-society technique. Instead, they propose to leave the matter for further study and for decision at some future date—which date, it is sadly to be feared, would be long postponed if the minority party had its way. For the truth is that, while the Republicans originated the idea of reciprocal-tariff bargaining, they have never been able to stop giving special favors to tariff-protected industries long enough to put the idea to effective use. The McKinley tariff of 1890 and the Dingley tariff of 1897 provided for reciprocity agreements with other countries, but, as Dr. F. W. Taussig points out in his Tariff History of the United States, actual results under those provisions were of small value and short duration.

It has remained for the present Secretary of State, Mr. Cordell Hull, to work out a practical application of the system and to give it breadth and scope and promise for the future. His achievements are no doubt bitter pills for the supporters of Fordney and McCumber and Hawley and Smoot to swallow, but they make good medicine for the country, and the renewal of the Hull prescription is well justified.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. If I have made a misstatement, I would be very glad to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 1 hour.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may proceed until he concludes his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Will the gentleman please supply the House with the names and addresses of the thousand economists who are in favor of this program?

Mr. DOUGHTON. The gentleman knows that this occurred. It never has been denied.

Their names were given at the time the Smoot-Hawley tariff law was enacted.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I am sincere about it. I would like to know.

Mr. DOUGHTON. I do not know that I can get the names of all of them, but it never has been questioned, as far as I know. If it is important to the gentleman I can verify it. I do not know that I could give the names of all of them. I do not know of any economist of any reputation whatever that took issue with them. More than a thousand of them came out in favor of it.

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS

It will be interesting, I am sure, to know what the women's organizations of the country think with regard to the trade-agreements program.

The principal women's organizations of the country were represented at the hearings just completed, and each and every one of these groups unanimously endorsed the trade-agreements program.

Mrs. Frederic Beggs, appearing for the General Federation of Women's Clubs, stated, among other things, as follows:

The Federation of Women's Clubs has in its membership more than 2,000,000 women. We have fifteen-thousand-some-odd clubs, and that means that there are 2,000,000 potential voters.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; I yield to the lady.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Were those statements from those women's clubs given before or after the hearings?

Mr. DOUGHTON. They were given during the hearings.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I asked because, after spending about a week going through these hearings, I did not see anything like that.

Mr. DOUGHTON. They were given during the hearings, and I can refer the lady to the page, chapter, and verse.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Since these hearings were concluded have you had any statements?

Mr. DOUGHTON. No; not since the hearings were concluded. You would not expect them to reverse themselves in 2 weeks, would you? [Laughter.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER. The statement to which the gentleman has referred will be found on page 2201 of the printed hearings, as well as all the other statements.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Yes; and I would commend that to the prayerful consideration of the gentle lady from Illinois. [Laughter.]

Mrs. Beggs says further:

So I am really representing a very special interest as a large group of purchasers. And I am also representing a large body of public opinion in this country.

We are glad, as I have said before, that these hearings are being held, and I want to add a personal word, if I may, in the form of a good, solid, Republican conviction that leaders of the opposition party, to which I have the honor to belong, will not be showing particularly good judgment if they introduce the reciprocal trade-agreements program in the campaign of 1940 as a partisan issue because there are far too many Republicans who understand the issues involved and who are ready to rise spontaneously to the support of the program.

Mrs. Harris T. Baldwin, representing the National League of Women Voters, said:

The National League of Women Voters wishes to express its support of reenactment of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act * * * (p. 2205).

Finally, it has opened the way to overcome foreign-trade obstacles and to gain foreign-trade advantages through the reciprocal-trade agreements (p. 2207).

* * * We are equally convinced that the best interests of the United States will be served by keeping the program as a means of promoting sane international trade relations when wars abroad end (p. 2208).

Mrs. J. Austin Stone, representing the National Women's Trade Union League of America, said:

I represent the National Women's Trade Union League of America, which has a direct and affiliated membership of over a million (p. 2210).

* * * * * * *

Before concluding, I should like to say a word about the change in world conditions since the program was adopted. It is, of course, a peacetime measure; and some persons argue that because there is now war in other parts of the world, it is of no value and might as well be allowed to lapse. The Women's Trade Union League is convinced that this would be a tragic mistake both from the standpoint of labor and from that of the Nation as a whole. * * * It is of the utmost importance to keep machinery alive by which, when peace does come, the flow of world trade may be quickly resumed; and, in spite of many difficulties, the trade-agreements program has already demonstrated its great usefulness in this respect (p. 2212).

Let me say to the gentle lady from Illinois that not a single woman appeared before the committee in opposition to this. All four of the women who did appear were among the most intelligent I have ever known. They appeared before our committee representing large organizations and spoke in support of the program. Not a single woman appeared there to utter one word in opposition to it. That must be very, very singular.

Dr. Caroline F. Ware, representing the American Association of University Women, stated:

I am here to speak from the point of view of the American consumer in support of the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. * * *

The American Association of University Women, which I represent, is an association of more than 65,000 members who are graduates of colleges and universities of high standing. * * *

My association has joined with the American Home Economics Association, numbering 15,000 professional members, and another 70,000 in student groups, and with the General Federation of Women's Clubs of over 2,000,000 members, in forming, with representatives of retail organizations, the National Consumer-Retailer Council.

The reciprocal trade-agreements program constitutes the first sustained effort on the part of the Government to consider the needs of the consumers as well as the desire of producers in the formulation of national tariff policies. Although consumers are the largest economic interest in the population, for we are all consumers, they have not been heard in the process of tariff making in the past (pp. 2213, 2214).

Dr. Ware, on page 2217, also has the following to say:

By means of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, American consumers have begun to secure consideration in the development of tariff policies. We do not want to go back. We urge the extension of the act in order that we may retain this small gain, at least until such time as the paramount interest of Americans as consumers receives wider recognition in all aspects of our national life, and production and trade are seen as means to an end, not as ends in themselves. We urge the Representatives of all districts to think not only of factories but of homes.

I cannot conclude my remarks in support of this farsighted and extremely beneficial program without rendering tribute to the one man, above all others, whose statesmanship, broad experience, wisdom, foresight, tact, and perseverance have made the administration of the reciprocal-trade program so successful. In my opinion, the Honorable Cordell Hull is one of the greatest Secretaries of State this Nation has ever produced. His outstanding public service and untiring, intelligent efforts to improve our relations with other countries specially entitle him to the unanimous acclaim of every citizen, not only of our own country but of all the nations of the world.

He has earned and has been given a place in the minds and hearts of his countrymen that will remain so long as our Nation endures. Statesman, scholar, thinker, and man of action, his record will stand as a monument which neither the passage of time nor the achievements of others can ever dim or destroy.

I thank you. [Applause.]

EXCERPTS FROM EDITORIALS

The American manufacturer and the American farmer are just about the most efficient in the world. The much vaunted cheap foreign labor, generally much more poorly equipped and managed, cannot displace them in the world markets in a fair fight.

This is illustrated in Venezuela which last year purchased $52,000,000 worth of goods from the United States. That was 56 percent of all its outside purchases.

Why didn't the cheap foreign labor of other countries get this business? It was because it couldn't deliver such articles as wheat, prepared milk, radios, lard, steel products, refrigerators, paints, and other items. * * *

Trade across international borders, as well as within a nation, provides more business, more wealth to consume, more jobs, more prosperity. (Knickerbocker News (Independent Republican), Albany, N. Y., November 11, 1939.)

Prior to the adoption of the original Trade Agreements Act in 1934, tariff legislation had been going from bad to worse. Advocates of prohibitive duties on sugar got together with advocates of high duties on wool, and the two groups collaborated with those who wanted high duties on cheese and butter and beef, and the result was an orgy of logrolling in which the interests of the Nation as a whole were forgotten. * * * (Baltimore Sun (Independent Democrat), January 12, 1940.)

* * * Most of those who are today attempting to destroy our trade program by making insupportable charges that it is injuring agriculture are the same false prophets who solemnly assured the farmers that the Hawley-Smoot embargoes would guarantee to them full and permanent prosperity; whereas, in actual fact, within 2 years from the enactment of the 1930 tariff, millions of farmers found themselves in or on the verge of bankruptcy. * * * Analysis of the results obtained under the trade-agreements program reveals that between 1935 and 1938 our exports of farm products to trade-agreement countries increased by nearly 50 percent, whereas to other countries they actually declined slightly. (The Times (Independent Democrat), Bayonne, N. J., December 5, 1939.)

---

* * * Does the United States want to trade or not? That is the larger issue. If it wishes to develop the great opportunity for exports to Latin America it must learn to take imports. And if it wishes to build Pan Americanism on sound economic foundations the United States must put trade which would benefit the Nation as a whole ahead of local fears of competition. (Christian Science Monitor, January 9, 1940.)

The object of the reciprocal-trade treaties has consisted in promoting commerce among nations through a reduction of tariffs. Like all economic problems broadly affecting the Nation, it should be approached dispassionately. It is unfortunate, therefore, that Secretary of State Hull, who has labored long, arduously, and sincerely in behalf of the trade pacts, is now obliged to confront palpably partisan and unsubstantiated claims tending to disparage his accomplishments. * * * (Boston Transcript (Independent Republican), December 9, 1939.)

* * * Whether the name "reciprocal-trade program" endures is not important, but the principles will have to be retained. Either we market these surpluses abroad or we must be content with want and plenty. (The News (Republican), Cleveland, Ohio, December 4, 1939.)

For the first time tariff problems are being handled honestly and scientifically. * * * It would be a political and economic crime to go back to the scandalous methods of Smoot-Hawley days. (The Times, Chicago, Ill., November 28, 1939.)

It is unfortunate that the tariff is being drawn once more into party politics, after a period of 5 years of relatively scientific tariff making. The trade agreements have been imperfect, of course. But they represent an immense step forward from the logrolling tactics Congress used for decades previously in the framing of tariffs. They also represent the most important contribution the United States can make toward a more tolerable world order. (Cincinnati Enquirer, November 29, 1939.)

Shall individual interests fix tariff rates to their own liking, let the volume of foreign trade fall where it may, or does volume of trade have a prior right as an item of national public welfare? * * * We believe that stimulating foreign trade is an essential part of stimulating private enterprise. * * * (The News (Republican), Cleveland, Ohio, January 8, 1940.)

The Hull reciprocal-trade agreements are under fire in Washington, and the fire will get hotter and hotter as we get nearer into 1940 with its conventions and election. * * * The voter, therefore, will do well to remember several things when the proposed barrage is laid down against the Hull agreements. He should remember that politics has much to do with it. He should remember, when his selfish interests are appealed to, that what may touch him lightly, if at all adversely, may be for the good of the Nation and the world as a whole. (The Democrat (Democrat), Davenport, Iowa, November 29, 1939.)

Conceivably there have been some minor inequities, involving particular farm products; these are matters of detail and are righted as rapidly as possible. But if the farmer has any recollection of the early 1930's he will take a long look before deserting the trade-agreement program. (The Register (Independent), Des Moines, Iowa, November 28, 1939.)

Think it over, farmers: * * * Again, now, as in the 1936 campaign, the air is full of assertions that American agriculture is being victimized for the benefit of American manufacturing industries by the trade-agreements program, which aims at cautious lowering of international-trade barriers.

In 1936 the phrase was "sold down the river."

Since all the preposterous charges in that period about our farmers having been victimized proved false alarms, this phrase is less used now. But it will probably bob up again. * * *

Every powerful industrial influence that in the past, during all of our times, has been fighting to benefit itself through sky-high tariff protection, at enormous cost to agriculture and to all other consumers of "protected" industrial products, is energetically behind the drive to destroy the trade-agreements program. Why?

Think it over, Mr. Farmer. (Des Moines Register (Independent), January 7, 1940.)

One of the major objectives of the reciprocal policy has been the opening of international channels of trade. It does not abandon protection, but it makes concessions in order that these channels may be developed, providing a greater two-way traffic between this country and other nations. In this broad policy it is the intent to gain benefits for a broad field of American products instead of following the narrow policy of giving absolute protection to a few at the expense of the many * * *. (The Press (Independent), Grand Rapids, Mich., December 9, 1939.)

The trade agreements represent the best way to open foreign markets, which the farmer must have for the sake of his own surpluses and which the industrial worker must have if he is to keep at work and be in a position to buy agricultural goods. To an extent that can hardly be measured, the farmer depends upon the trade agreements to maintain his markets, both foreign and domestic. * * *

The Republicans may as well realize that they cannot win the next Presidential election merely by an inchoate, contradictory appeal to the prejudices of varied blocs of voters. Such a program was attempted in 1936, and it failed miserably. If the Republicans are to win, they must convince the voters that they have a program of action that in both its domestic and its foreign aspects makes consistent sense. Reciprocal-trade agreements are an integral part of such a program, for they offer the only feasible device by which surpluses, both agricultural and industrial, can find their way into foreign markets, thereby making for prosperity at home and for peace abroad. For further particulars, read the last speech of that great Republican protectionist, William McKinley. (The Courant (Republican), Hartford, Conn., November 25, 1939.)

Much has been written about the moral obligation of the United States to use her vast economic power to create a better world, in which advantages will be more equitably distributed. In such a world, it is admitted, the threat of war would be diminished greatly.

We hope some Republican orator or the spokesman for some protectionist industry will explain how that can be done by returning to the Smoot-Hawley tariff philosophy. (The Post, Houston, Tex., November 28, 1939.)

The last Republican tariff, enacted in 1930, was directly responsible for the establishment of foreign-trade barriers against American commerce. It aided in destroying the farmer's market. Hundreds of economists warned against its effects. Even Herbert Hoover signed it reluctantly. But the grabbing, selfish interests had their way. American industry and agriculture, instead of being protected, were dealt a crushing blow in those early depression years when they needed a stimulant rather than a club. * * *

The trade agreements rank with social security and bank-deposit insurance among the reforms made in the last 7 years. To abolish them would be a senseless step backward. (The Journal (Independent), Kansas City, Mo., January 8, 1940.)

The protective tariff is a game of boycott at which two can play, and every country in the world has played to its own hurt. When a European settlement is reached, we may find ourselves competing with a united world, including South and Central America, unless we do some adjusting beforehand. Industrialists and financiers have begun to realize this; but an old generalization is revived to fool the farmers. * * * The real organized and financed fight against the New Deal is waged by those who wish to regain financial control of the Nation. Farmers have only to look back over the last half century to see what that would do to agricultural policies. (The Courier Journal, Louisville, Ky., December 7, 1939.)

That dairy farmers of Wisconsin have probably been fed more misinformation and falsehood on the reciprocal-trade agreements than on any other single subject affecting the interests of agriculture. * * * (The Times (Independent), Madison, Wis., December 13, 1939.)

The response to the Hoover-Grundy law was reprisals by 29 nations, among them Canada, our most important customer. There was no unfriendliness in this; there was only recognition that a producer must buy from those who buy from him. It is the way he has of paying.

The only blow struck at the Hawley-Smoot tariff in the 9 years since its enactment has been the Hull trade agreements. * * *

Politicians love a tariff issue. It saves them from having to think. The Republican Party for years pointed out to the farmer that what he produced was on the free list. It gave him a higher duty and put a countervailing duty on manufactures the farmer had to buy. thus taking from agriculture any gains it possibly could have made.

The same old talk is being revived today by men looking for a befogging issue to reelect them next year. * * * The Republican Party's policy of tariff subsidies to manufacturers with deceiving lip service to agriculture, pursued from the Civil War on, nearly wrecked this country in the 1920's and early thirties. Is it the idea of Republican leaders that they should finish the job? (The Journal (Independent), Milwaukee, Wis., December 3, 1939.)

The best and surest way to scuttle the reciprocal-trade program would be to require Senate ratification of trade treaties negotiated by the executive branch of Government, a procedure which many Senators favor. * * *

It would be a major mistake if the reciprocal treaties, which already have proven their worth in boosting foreign trade and stimulating domestic production, were now to be cast to the mercies of lawmakers, who would seize upon them to make political capital and to help them in their "horse-trading" deals with their colleagues. * * * (The Star Journal (Independent), Minneapolis, Minn., December 28, 1939.)

A lot of us are inclined to approve of Secretary Hull's trade policy as applied to all lines except our own. * * * Some people are beginning to suspect that we can't increase sales abroad unless we increase purchases. It's about time for a serious study of this whole question by the public and by Congress. * * * (The News (Independent), Minot, N. Dak., December 4, 1939.)

This opposition to the reciprocal-trade program, which many consider a prescription for lasting peace if universally accepted, must be resisted by the Nation. The country's national welfare must not be subjugated to selfish private interests. For how can the United States expect to sell abroad while refusing to buy in return? (The Register (Independent Democrat), Mobile, Ala., November 28, 1939.)

If the treaty opponents can't kill the program they would like to suspend it. Their argument is that the war has so disturbed trade conditions as to make the effect of the agreements uncertain. But that probably is a cloak hiding other reasons which won't stand open discussion. It certainly is not convincing. If the treaties have had the effect of creating order and confidence in the trade between nations, it stands to reason that steadying influence will be most needed now and after the war. It is conceivable that in the post-war confusion the treaty system might become the solid mooring post to which the world can tie its foreign-trade relations. On the other hand, there probably could be no better way to breed more chaos than by continued pursuit of the theories of high tariffs, self-sufficiency and isolation. (Times-Picayune, New Orleans, La., December 6, 1939.)

To strike at the trade-agreements policy will be to strike a blow at peace and international cooperation. To renew the policy will be to reassert our faith that nations are not mere competitors in a ruthless struggle for markets, but mutual customers, dependent on each other and able to supply one another's essential needs in a spirit of equality and good will. (New York Times, December 19, 1939.)

To return to the logrolling and political deals of the patchwork tariff days, and thereby invite repetition of inevitable reprisals, would be a definite step backward—in trade as well as in the promotion of world peace. (The Oregon Journal (Independent-Republican) Portland, Oreg., December 26, 1939.)

Facts, not emotional prejudices, the whole rather than the partial effect of the Hull agreements, should determine their fate. (The Oregon Journal (Independent-Republican) Portland, Oreg., January 8, 1940.)

The Smoot-Hawley tariff was in many parts simply a bill to highjack the American consumer. It is still on the books because it seemed better trading to get from other nations a lower tariff on our imports than just to lower our barriers hoping they would go big-hearted, too, and lower theirs out of Christian charity. That was what the trade agreements now under fire, tried to do. * * * They do not show great harm to any important group in agriculture, industry, or labor, but show a great good to all groups, to all consumers, to reemployment and the country as a whole.

So what's all the shooting for? Obviously it is either to protect the Smoot-Hawley schedules or it is an effort, in a new high-carnival of old-time logrolling lobbying, to soak the consumer with even higher rates. (One Man's Opinion, by Hugh S. Johnson, Washington News, January 10, 1940.)

If the volume of foreign imports is further restricted and their price raised, several effects on American business are inevitable: American consumers must pay more for some of the things they need; American manufacturers must pay more for some of their raw materials. The result will be to raise their expense of doing business and to restrict the market for their product because of higher prices if they attempt to pass this added price on to the consumers. And finally, since imports are ultimately the only means that the outside world has of paying for American goods—barring a certain amount of more unneeded and unwanted gold—we are bound to cut down our exports to the same extent we cut down our imports. The result can only be to injure our farmers and manufacturers and to create internal disequilibrium. * * * If the Republicans as a body vote for the defeat of the Hull trade policy, if they demand a policy of embargo tariffs, they will be guilty not merely of bad economics but of bad politics. * * * (New York Times, January 12, 1940.)

This program is not popular with lobbyists. Back in the days of Smoot-Hawley and Fordney-McCumber and Payne-Aldrich, tariff making was almost the exclusive province of lobbyists skilled in applying pressure on Congressmen, masters of back scratching and logrolling. The Hull idea of having the trade experts of our Government get together with the trade experts of some other government and arrive at an agreement for the mutual benefit of both countries, is directly opposite to the lobbyist's idea of the way to do business. * * * These are things to bear in mind as the tariff fight swings into crescendo in Washington. It will help the rest of us to remain more or less calm if we remember that most of the commotion is supplied by lobbyists singing for their supper. (Washington News, January 11, 1940.)

Too often in the past, discussion of the tariff program of this Nation has descended to the level of waving a tinned Polish ham under the nose of the voters and shouting: "This is what the Government is doing to our farmers—giving their markets to other nations."

The most elementary cerebration should lead one to the conclusion that foreign trade is a matter of give and take. We cannot expect to have good customers abroad if we are not good customers, too.

Attacks on the Hull program which are not well-founded in facts and figures may boomerang on their authors. * * * (McKeesport News, McKeesport, Pa., January 13, 1940.)

The chief "come on" slogan, to catch the farmer vote on behalf of sky-high tariff policies is going to be, as usual "the American Market for the American Farmer."

Of course the farmer is not expected to do any heavy thinking as to what this implies. He has been fooled by it before. He is expected to be a push-over for the siren song again. * * * Inevitably, such policies of exclusion for all foreign goods implies terriffic penalization of those huge parts of our agriculture that produce surpluses for export. * * * In short carried to its inevitable conclusion, a real policy of the absolute complete American market for the American farmer means the ending of our farm exports. * * * And it means rapidly throwing huge parts of our farm production over into competition, in the domestic markets, with farmers who are not now surplus producers.

In short, the seductive slogan "the American Market for the American Farmer" leads straight to economic disaster for farmers as a whole, more than any other class.

"Penny wise and pound foolish" is the wise old phrase that fits the policy—like a glove—that our farmers are now asked to follow. (Des Moines Register (Independent), Des Moines, Iowa, January 10, 1940.)

Of all the fake political nostrums ever peddled the American farmer, the protective tariff is doubtless the phoniest.

After that last big war, the farm-the-farmer lobbyists and politicians sold the Fordney-McCumber tariff as the sure cure for all rural aches and pains. The result was that foreign countries which had been buying our cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, cattle, etc., started growing their own and buying elsewhere. * * * An effort was made to remedy that by lending more dollars abroad, which was a good racket while it lasted. * * * So the lobbyists and politicians started their medicine show again. Their new concoction bore the label of Smoot-Hawley, and was guaranteed to cure the tuberculosis, cancer, lumbago, and gout of the farm belt, and give American farmers a monopoly on the American market. It almost made good on that latter claim, but in so doing it knocked in the head the farmer's foreign markets, far more important to him than a domestic monopoly. Though by 1932 there was scarcely a trickle of farm imports, that act did little good for our farmers who got 5 cents for their cotton, 10 cents for corn, and "two bits" for wheat. * * *

Once again the farmers of farmers, who pitched their medicine tents in the lobbies of Washington, are crying out the old quack cure. They want to abolish the Hull reciprocal-trade treatment and persuade the patient to take a suck out of the same old protective tariff bottle. Is there a farmer in the audience who, having taken that "cure" twice, still has enough strength to step forward and give a testimonial? (The News (Independent), San Francisco, Calif., January 13, 1940.)

Opponents of the trade-agreement policy fall into several groups. The high-tariff advocates naturally object to it. Men who wish to embarrass the Roosevelt administration may think this is a good way to do so. Sticklers for precedent in tariff making perhaps see in this a subversive practice.

We have no sympathy with any of these groups. The plan of adjustment by executive agreement has proved its value, and should not now be dropped. (Cleveland Plain Dealer (Independent Democrat), Cleveland, Ohio, January 13, 1940.)

Much ado has been made about the imports of foodstuffs without explaining how much of the total has been made up of non-competitive food articles like bananas, coconuts, and coconut oil, or such as cattle from Canada and Mexico, which the cattle feeders want. Skillfully planting their men in these farmers' organizations and beating the tom-tom about food imports, the manufacturers of the country have been able to scare these farmers' groups into passing resolutions denouncing the trade pacts.

This scheme of using the farmer as a mark is an old one. The farmers, as a whole, are too little informed of how protection will aid them, and do not realize that a tariff on most farm products does them no good. * * *

The ignorance of the farmer on this matter has been used by the Republicans, representing the industrialists, to support every tariff protection bill since the time of the Civil War. And so it is now with the trade treaties. Although the opposition cannot point to a single instance where industry or agriculture has been damaged, and although it carefully neglects telling about any of the benefits, it conjures up the bogeyman of foreign competition to frighten the farmer as a means of helping the industrialist. The poor farmer does not realize that he has been competing with the bogeyman of foreign competition even when he was assured the all-time high Smoot-Hawley tariff was in effect. * * * (The Star (I), Tucson, Ariz., January 16, 1940.)

The Hawley-Smoot tariff helped wreck American foreign trade, including the export market. The agreements are showing impressive results in reviving foreign trade, including the export market. Yet the same crowd that hailed the destructive Hawley-Smoot tariff as a great achievement to bring America out of the depression is now fighting the trade agreements.

The question is whether the country shall turn back toward the Hawley-Smoot barriers, which were dictated by political considerations, or shall go forward on a competently worked out nonpolitical trade policy that has demonstrated its great value to American agriculture and industry. * * * (The Kansas City Times, Kansas City, Mo., January 12, 1940.)

When Governor Murphy of New Hampshire tells a House committee that the reciprocal trade agreement program "may imperil the very economic existence of our six (New England) States," he plainly is not dealing in known economic facts. Both New England and the Nation are more prosperous today than they were when the trade-agreements program was adopted. And one of the reasons for this better prosperity is the rise that has occurred in American exports since the program was put into effect. * * * (Providence Journal, January 24, 1940.)

It must have been something to listen to gentle slow-spoken Cordell Hull read his prepared statement on the reciprocal-trade agreements to the House Ways and Means Committee. * * *

Hull's worst enemies must admit it was an impressive performance. But while they are acknowledging this they had best look to their ammunition, for the facts that the mild-mannered Secretary of State marshaled in orderly review can't be laughed off; they can't be disregarded. If extension of the reciprocal-trade program were to be decided in a vacuum, on its merits alone without benefit of politics, it would not be too much to say that Hull all but won his case yesterday.

He did not stop with merely denouncing the "reckless claims" of "unscrupulous" critics. Any small-bore politician could have done that. Hull showed exactly why the claims are "reckless" and the critics "unscrupulous." With the accuracy of a hill-country squirrel shooter he ripped the dead center of the bull's-eye time after time. * * * (The Beacon-Journal (I. R.), Akron, Ohio, January 30, 1940.)

Unless the Congress can put forth some better means of promoting commerce it had best give careful attention to Secretary Hull's plea for continuance of the Reciprocal Trade Act.

Making of these treaties has seemed to a great many observers a work of far-reaching importance. The plan is not to be lightly discarded, unless there is something better to replace it. Thus far it would appear that no program more effective for encouraging international trade has been offered. * * * The separate treaties thus far consummated may not be ideals of perfection. But at least in some instances they are filling what otherwise might be virtually a vacuum. Whatever their faults or their lack, they are contributing to commerce. So doing, they are promoting friendships. Many wish that they might be extended to more nations, even to those now "blacklisted." They should fill a more valuable role when war is over, in helping bring world-wide economic stability. * * * (Baton Rouge Times, Baton Rouge, La.)

Where the adverse publicity to the reciprocal-trade treaties comes from originally, we do not know. It may be the work of antinew dealers who wish to discredit the administration on any point possible. It may come from industrialists and Congressmen of the type who more than 50 years ago kidded the western farmer into thinking that tariffs were his savior, his benefactor, his God Almighty.

Before the North Dakota farmer goes off the "deep end," he should be warned that cancelation of reciprocal-trade treaties will hurt the farmer, not help him; will make him and his country economically poorer, not richer, will tend to make them both politically insecure. * * * There is no reason, however, for the farmer to believe that every farm product shipped into the United States competes with him. He should not develop a persecution complex on the trade-treaty question. Before the farmer starts another farm-suicide trend he might find out what's to his benefit, compared with what appears to be for his own good. (Bismarck Capitol, Bismarck, N. Dak., December 28, 1939.)

Republican leaders in Congress look upon the reciprocal trade agreements program as the major issue in the next session, according to an Associated Press dispatch. Minority Leader MARTIN of Massachusetts and 22 other New England Republican Members have prepared exhaustive reports showing how the program has worked against New England industry, farming, and fishing.

For more reasons than one, this is a dangerous subject for the Republicans to take under their wing in the coming session. A year ago, when the world was more or less at peace, it would have been safer ground. But now the issue of peace for the United States has become of pressing importance, and the administration has been given the opportunity of emphasizing more strongly than ever the function of a free reciprocal trade policy in the preservation of friendly international relations. * * * We do not think there is much to be said for high protective tariffs as an economic expedient. At the moment, there seems to be even less to be said for them as a political expedient. A tariff plank might woo a few farmers away from the munificence of the New Deal, and it would probably gratify a good many industrialists who are, however, already prepared to vote Republican come what may. But given the sort of interpretation it is certain to receive from a democratic political organization that knows its business, the policy seems more likely to alienate large numbers of voters who will look at it as a sectional movement against the best interests of the Nation as a whole, and not calculated to promote the one thing we all hope for—peace. (The Herald (Independent), Rutland, Vt., December 28, 1939.)

There may be, and probably are, defects in the reciprocal-trade policy of the national administration, and certainly it is easy to find those who dislike it because it has resulted in some reduction of tariff barriers upon certain articles in which they are particularly interested. However, as it is a national policy intended to operate for the greatest good of the greatest number of our people, it seems fair to consider its effect on the Nation as a whole. * * * So on the face of the record the fact seems to be that, at least so far, the reciprocal-trade treaties certainly have not hurt us in the matter of favorable balance of foreign trade. We have sold abroad a surprisingly greater amount than we have bought from abroad, viewing the entire foreign-trade picture from the standpoint of the Nation as a whole, which is of course the proper view of a national policy. (The Press (Democratic), Sheridan, Wyo., January 5, 1939.)

Inasmuch as the trade-agreements controversy has taken on a dominantly partisan coloration, the President could hardly fail to defend this part of his program if only for political reasons. Insofar as attack is Republican in origin and partisan in motivation, it must be answered in like manner.

Beyond that, and far more important, is the fact that no administration—Republican or Democrat—could abandon such a promising contribution to the rebuilding of prosperity and peace without thereby confessing to a disregard for the national welfare.

The Hull program has been the target of many and varied shafts, but none has succeeded in finding a breach in the truth of these fundamental propositions: Artificial barriers to international trade destroy free markets and sources of supplies, hinder the exchange of surplus goods with its mutual benefits, and result in a universally lowered standard of living. Nations surrounded by such barriers tend to seek relief in forceful action. The negotiation of nondiscriminatory reductions in trade barriers is the most practicable and the most promising method yet devised to promote the economic well-being of the United States and the peaceableness of other less fortunate nations. (The Dispatch (Independent), Minneapolis, Minn., January 5, 1940.)

The lesson in the relationship between external trade and internal prosperity which America has had since the imposition of the Hawley-Smoot tariff should have been enough to persuade labor of the fallacy of trying to raise the standard of living by cutting off imports of foreign-made goods, and of the necessity of reducing barriers to trade if prosperity is to be restored. * * * No imports means no exports; a curtailment of foreign market means ruin for large parts of the country and consequently a curtailed domestic market. The resulting lack of business means unemployment and low wages. (The Pioneer Press (Independent), St. Paul, Minn., December 18, 1939.)

The big point of distinction between the New Deal and this old principle of the Republican Party is that the New Deal does not content itself with giving protection to those who seek to have the Government protect their investments. The New Deal extends Government protection to labor and other groups. And if capital and profits are entitled to governmental protection, why should not labor and other groups get protection? The apparent justice of such an idea accounts for the strength of the New Deal. (The Star (Independent), Tucson, Ariz., November 23, 1939.)

"To separate foreign trade from politics." Shades of Willis Hawley and Reed Smoot. If ever politics sired a vampire to suck the lifeblood out of our foreign trade the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930 was it. The Hull program, far from being bound up in politics, was designed to rid our foreign trade of the curse of politically logrolled tariff barriers behind which our commerce had languished. * * * Farmers will do well to regard skeptically the clever charges that the trade agreements have favored industry at their expense. * * * If he has a vivid recollection of the early 1930's—as what farmer has not?—surely he will hesitate before being sold that bill of shoddy goods again. (The Star Free Press (Independent), Ventura, Calif., November 27, 1939.)

The American people may well view with mingled emotions of regret and concern the political storm which is blowing up around the proposal to renew the reciprocal trade agreements program which will expire on June 12 unless legislation authorizing its continuance is enacted in the interim. In making a decision of this kind there is no place for partisan politics, no room for the manifestations of narrow sectionalism which have characterized some of our tariff policies in the past. It is a determination which calls for statesmanship of the highest order, and if the Congress fails to meet this requirement—if it does not look beyond the selfish arguments of special interest groups—it will have rendered a disservice to this country and to the world at large which will have evil consequences for many years to come. * * * The Hull program is not a panacea for all of the world's trade ills, and the obstacles confronting it are increased manyfold in time of war, but the Star most earnestly hopes that the trade-agreement legislation will be renewed by this Congress. When peace comes it must be founded upon some such forward-looking program, and for the United States to abandon Secretary Hull's policies at this time would be an unthinkable backward step. (The Star (Independent), Washington, D. C., January 10, 1940.)

In the present critical period of international affairs no statesman has managed to combine a passionate devotion to principle and the calm moderation of logical thought with greater success than Secretary of State Cordell Hull. Mr. Hull detests as cordially as any man the use of "arbitrary force as the basis of international conduct." But, while nearly every other national spokesman, both in this country and abroad, has occasionally given way to prejudice or fear, Mr. Hull has remained magnificently aloof on his own high plane. (The Journal Every Evening, Wilmington, Del., May 23, 1939.)

Were we to return to the old principle that we can erect high tariff walls to keep foreign goods out of America while, at the same time, expecting other nations to admit freely our manufactured products, it would be a great mistake. If we expect other nations to admit our products, we must be willing, in return, to admit their products to this country. If the lessons of the past have taught anything, it is this, and a great many American manufacturers realize it fully. * * * America needs world markets. The prosperity of business, industry, and labor depends upon our ability to sell our goods abroad. We cannot hope to retain such world markets, however, if we are unwilling to permit the entrance of foreign goods into this country and any argument to the contrary cannot stand. The Republican Party should not as a pure matter of political expediency take a position which it will find later is neither logical nor wise. (The Times (I. R.) Watertown, N. Y., January 8, 1940.)

As for this drive in Congress, it is backed by interests which feel that they have been definitely injured by the lowering of certain tariff rates in the reciprocal treaties now in operation, and by other interests which fear that they will be damaged by future treaties. * * * Whatever faults may be disclosed in Secretary Hull's practical handiwork, he is right in principle when he holds that increased trade is essential to the advancement of peace. (The Gazette (I. R.), Worcester, Mass., January 8, 1940.)

The board of commerce has taken a well-advised action. If tariffs are not to be thrown back to the mercies of the dicker-and-trade system in Congress, it is essential that the defense of the reciprocal system have expression on a scale and with determination meeting the vigor and intensity characterizing the concerted drive being made to do away with the trade bargains. (The News (I.), Detroit, Mich., January 23, 1940.)

The authority on which Secretary of State Hull and his aides have been acting is about to end and Congress is making up its mind whether to renew it.

The trouble is that this very important economic policy is being attacked in an atmosphere of partisan politics which results in exaggerated statements. It would be more convincing if those who talk or write about this matter would get down—painful as it is—to a study of facts. (Times-Star (Independent), Bridgeport, Conn., January 25, 1940.)

Mr. Hull's commendable work has never been more essential than today amid clashing and narrow nationalisms which have already precipitated one war and may lead to others. There are many ways of bringing about a friendly and cooperative world, and to trade for mutual benefit is certainly one of them. This is no time to abandon it. (Boston Evening Transcript, December 9, 1939.)

Even high-tariff Republicans admit that Mr. Hull's trade treaties have removed from Congress some of the worst aspects of log-rolling. If you pinned them down they would admit that congressional vote swapping is expensive for the country and raises the devil with wise national policy. * * * (Berkshire Eagle (I.), Pittsfield, Mass., December 29, 1939.)

Let this be a warning: Destroy reciprocal-trade agreements and you cast this Nation out of the role that history seems to have ordained for us in fashioning a world where free men can trade with their neighbors and through this trade give sustenance to the roots of peace. (The Evening Bulletin (Independent), Providence, R. I., January 11, 1940.)

Today agriculture, to live, must sell its surplus abroad. To do that it must exchange raw products for finished goods and other raw products. American industry, for the most part, is strong enough to compete with that of other nations. In those few instances where it is not, it should be protected.

But if we are to achieve a balanced economy, we must have a freer exchange of goods. Tariff dams will have to be destroyed. The water of commerce will have to flow in a steady stream for all to enjoy. You are going to hear a great deal shortly about "protection for our American industries," and most of it will be sheer, unadulterated bunk, put out by selfish persons for their own profit. * * * (The Star-Tribune, Providence, R. I.)

The belief that the domestic farmer is being driven out of the domestic market by imported foreign products, therefore, appears to be without substantial foundation. The problem of the farmer, indeed, has quite different roots. As Mr. Hull points out, the United States normally produces not merely enough to satisfy domestic needs but a great surplus besides, which, if it is not sold abroad, means disastrously low domestic prices, with consequent agricultural distress. And the only way in which the agricultural surpluses can be sold abroad is to make arrangements with other nations whereby they can sell more of their products in the United States in exchange for wheat, cotton, and lard. Indeed, the administration has endeavored so diligently to find outlets for surplus agricultural products that the workers of the East have sometimes been led to complain that they, not the farmer, are being "sold down the river."

The fact is that neither the farmers nor the workers of the United States are being sold out by a policy whose chief purpose is to facilitate the production and exchange of goods. For every item sold by a foreign producer in the United States, the United States sells another item abroad. * * * The realization that closed markets and restricted production, whether on a national scale or an international, means not increased prosperity but only shared poverty for everyone, whether he be a domestic producer or a foreign, whether he be a farmer or a worker, may be hard to learn; but it must be learned if the world, and the United States included, is to resume its progress toward economic democracy. * * * (The Courant (Republican), Hartford, Conn., August 2, 1939.)

The proposed attack on the Reciprocal Tariff Act brings dismaying evidence that some in the Republican Party are still living in the past century. * * * (The Courant (Republican), Hartford, Conn., August 27, 1937.)

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 1 hour and 12 minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the tariff debate in 1930 a member of the majority of the committee at that time made the following statement concerning the Hawley-Smoot bill, and I inject it at this part of the discussion because reference has been made to it on several occasions and I want it to appear in the RECORD as a correct quotation. The paragraph reads as follows:

Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, once this bill becomes a law confidence will be immediately restored, we shall gradually work out of the temporary slump we have been in for the last few months and once more prosperity will reign supreme, foreign reprisals will vanish into thin air, and we shall continue to raise the standard of American labor and American wages. We shall dissipate the dark clouds of your gloomy prophecy with the sunshine of a continuing prosperity.

The prophet stands before you, discredited to some extent by the sequence of unfortunate world events that followed the passage of that bill. I might rightfully trespass on your time and your patience in order to establish a long list of alibis, but I shall not do that. I shall refrain, and comfort myself with the knowledge that at least I thought I was right. Being right, of course, does not always bring its own reward. I am reminded of an epitaph on a man's tombstone who had been killed in an automobile accident. The epitaph ran something like this:

Here lies the body of Jonathan Hay
Who died disputing the right of way.
He said he was right, that's the same old song,
But he's just as dead as if he'd been wrong.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I have heard a good deal of discussion here today about tariff bills and tariff policies and I hope a little later on to have something to say about the way my friends on this side of the House handled tariff bills some few years ago. Do you know that only 6 Members of this Seventy-sixth Congress were Members of the House when the Underwood-Simmons bill was written and became the law? There are only 28 Members of the present Congress who were here when the Fordney-McCumber bill was enacted into law. There are less than 100, or considerably less than 25 percent of the present membership of the House, who were here when the Hawley-Smoot bill became law. Such are the ravages of time, political hysteria, and of death. Thus the matter of tariff discussion, pro and con, to the other 332 Members of the House is largely a matter of tradition.

During the debates on the 1913 bill the free-trade policy had many stanch supporters in this Congress, but as good judgment displaced prejudice during the lapse of years, by the time the Fordney-McCumber bill was presented our friends on the Democratic side had thrown up a breastwork defense which they labeled "tariff for revenue only." There were scarcely a half dozen who still clung to the outmoded fetish of free trade. That showed a remarkable advance in constructive thinking. The tariff has been a burning issue over a long period of years, and not very much that is new has been uttered in defense of or against its merits. The two closing speeches on the Wilson bill in 1893, one by the Honorable Thomas Brackett Reed and the other by the then Speaker of the House, Mr. Crisp, have always seemed to me to be the most complete in their analysis and conclusions.

It is interesting at this time to note that when the Wilson bill was found to be incapable of producing the revenue necessary even at that time, an amendment was added providing for our first income tax, calculated to provide $75,000,000 in revenue, which the tariff did not provide. That amendment was adopted and became part of the law, but was held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. It is interesting to remember that at that time the returns from the customhouse practically paid the expenses of running the Federal Government. To the new dealer who thinks only in billions, customhouse revenues are mere "chicken feed."

It appears from the speeches and the remarks that were made during the hearings that my friends, the Democrats, have at last found a tariff policy that apparently meets with their approval. They have been a long time arriving at this conclusion. In 1912 the Democratic Party reiterated a previous charge they had made that the laying of tariff duties except for the purpose of revenue was unconstitutional. In 1916 they advocated a tariff for revenue only; in 1920 a tariff for revenue. They omitted the "only." In 1924 they advocated a competitive tariff, and in 1928, according to the famous Raskob telegram, Democratic congressional candidates were all "in the bag" for a protective tariff, and business had nothing to fear if Al Smith was elected. In 1932 they demanded the repeal of the Hawley-Smoot Act, and they romped and ranted up and down the hustings vociferously berating this law and promising to deal it a death blow when they were placed in power.

Seven years, seven long years, have taken wing and the Hawley-Smoot Act is still on the statute books, somewhat battered and bruised, but still in the ring. In view of subsequent developments along trade-treaty lines, what a material advantage they had in having the Hawley-Smoot rates to use for trading purposes. The rates in the Underwood-Simmons bill would have provided no opportunity to trade.

Now, reckless statements are constantly made about how much the ultimate consumer has to pay when we have a protective tariff. I remember one witness appearing before us this year who appeared in 1929. He appeared for an industry that has been harder pressed to hold 50 percent of its business in this country than any other industry in the United States. I refer to the pottery industry. In answer to the reckless statements as to what additional burden some of the rates would place upon consumers, I am going to quote from the evidence of Mr. Wells. This is a short paragraph appearing on page 1276 of the hearings in 1929. He made the following statement:

> Our prices today are much lower than they were in 1922. When the Fordney-McCumber bill was passed prophecies were made by the friends of importers on the floor of the Senate that the addition of a small ad valorem duty would increase the price to the housewives of this country by $12,000,000 in their annual purchases. The actual fact is that they are buying American and foreign dishes today, in 1929, for 25 percent less than they bought them in 1922.

No substantial evidence has been offered at any time that the Hawley-Smoot Act caused a rise in prices. In those days and even now I sometimes feel that placing the tariff policy in the hands of the Democratic Party is a good deal like placing an osteopath in charge of an allopathic hospital because he gave his own children castor oil. It is just about as appropriate.

I notice my very dear friend, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, made some reference to the terrifically bad treatment the Democrats received when the Hawley-Smoot bill was being considered. He said they were not allowed to offer amendments and were not allowed to consider the measure. All tariff bills have been written in executive session by the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee, irrespective of which party was writing the tariff bill, and they have all been considered very largely under what might be considered by some as a gag rule because you never could get through with it any other way. I want particularly to call your attention to a report I have here, taken from the New York Times in 1913, when the Underwood-Simmons bill was under consideration in the House, just to indicate their liberality and also the method used by my Democratic friends at that time. I desire to do this because in 1930 Mr. GARNER, the distinguished Vice President of the United States, then a Member of the House, said to the Republicans, when the Hawley-Smoot bill was about to be considered:

> I solicit of you at least honesty in the consideration of it. You should consider it according to the rules of the House and not put it on its passage without full and free discussion.

Let us see what happened when the Underwood-Simmons bill was being considered.

> APRIL 9, 1913.
> The Democrats this day began consideration of the tariff bill behind closed doors in a party caucus, proceeding under the 5-minute rule. Schedules A and B, chemicals, etc., were taken up. All proposed amendments to the committee bill were defeated.

The press report states that President Wilson revisited the Capitol—evidently he had been there before—for the purpose of conferring with Members on the proposed bill. The following is an excerpt from the article as it appeared in the New York Times:

> Some of the amendments under consideration by the President and his Cabinet, as well as in the House and Senate, involved correction of obvious oversights on the part of the majority of the Ways and Means Committee. One of these was the leaving of mohair with a duty of 20 percent while raw wool was put on the free list.

Mohair is the coat of the Angora goat, raised extensively in Texas. The 20 percent on mohair remained in the bill in spite of the President's visit to the Capitol, but a duty on wool was denied although offered in the committee. Representative Dies, the father of our distinguished Representative DIES, sought a duty of 15 percent ad valorem, but the sheep's wool was not to be considered, nothing but the mohair of the goat, and the wool duty was not allowed.

So every schedule was considered in Democratic caucus. The votes are here given. It was one of those caucuses that must have leaked. The vote is given on all these propositions. The cotton schedule was completed, it being adopted without change. A proposal to increase the rate on collars was defeated 96 to 27.

Then on April 18 other standing committee amendments were adopted and in accordance with an understanding of the previous day and in response to pressure from various sources, the committee agreed to rescind their action in the matter of placing a duty of 50 cents a pound on vanilla beans.

That sounds a little bit like logrolling, does it not? "Pressure from outside sources." Discussion on the wool schedule was continued. Representative Bathwick, of Ohio, offered an amendment to put ready-made clothing on the free list. The vote was 99 against and 68 in favor of the motion.

That is sufficient to show you that very little attention should be paid to the criticism leveled at us by our distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and others with regard to the unfair treatment accorded them.

Mr. BOEHNE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BOEHNE. When the Underwood bill was written in 1913 in 1914 did we not have a pattern to go by; namely, the Payne-Aldrich bill of 1908 or 1909?

Mr. CROWTHER. I am not discussing the pattern of your bill.

Mr. BOEHNE. I was speaking of the pattern of drawing up the bill.

Mr. CROWTHER. You can go farther back than that. You can go back to the old Wilson-Gorman bill and the Dingley bill, where you would find similar patterns.

Mr. BOEHNE. The Payne-Aldrich bill was fresh in the minds of both parties in 1913.

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not think the query is particularly relevant. I simply desire to show the uniformity of procedure by both political parties. To sum up, the Underwood-Simmons bill was written by the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee and was considered for amendment first in a Democratic caucus under the 5-minute rule. I do not remember that we ever followed that procedure on our side of the House.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN. The gentleman might not remember that the Republicans ever considered any such matters in caucus, but the gentleman certainly will remember that when his party was in power they adopted the tactics, as did the Democrats, of writing their own revenue bills and tariff bills at all times.

Mr. CROWTHER. I so stated a moment ago.

Mr. COCHRAN. This occurred not only on this side of the Capitol but on the other side, because at one time I happened to be secretary to a Senator who was on the Senate Finance Committee, and that was the policy over there as it was here.

Mr. CROWTHER. May I again state to the gentleman from Missouri that I have already testified to that effect?

Of course, the word was passed around that the Republicans had about as much chance of getting an amendment of any kind adopted as the proverbial snowball had of maintaining its integrity in the torrid temperature of hades. But enough of that. I believe the criticism will probably cease in the future with regard to the method of handling tariff bills. Let us get a little closer to the subject at hand, because, as I say, a good deal of water has gone over the dam since the Democrats declared the policy of tariff-raising for anything except revenue unconstitutional. Woodrow Wilson held that view in one of his books, but he afterward withdrew his former statement on that subject.

There has been some criticism about my inconsistency in even prophesying that there would be a period of prosperity following the Hawley-Smoot Act. I just want to call attention to one or two more inconsistencies that developed on the other side of the House. When we had the flexible clause in the 1930 bill, and it was also in the 1922 bill, it was singled out by several Members of the House as their particular grievance against the bill. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], now the Vice President, and several others used that for their text. They did not say much about rates at that time but they did inveigh against the policy of the flexible tariff.

Comparing the flexible-tariff provision of 1922 and of 1930 with the reciprocal-trade-treaty program is about like comparing chickenpox with smallpox. It is certainly a tremendously milder proposition than the trade-treaty program.

Many even on the Democratic side feel that the State Department went clear beyond the intent of Congress in changing the excise taxes, particularly on oil. But mild as the flexible clause was, it was the subject of most vociferous and vitrolic criticism both here and in the body at the other end of this building. A round robin was signed by the members of the Finance Committee at the other end of the Capitol inveighing against the adoption of this policy. My distinguished chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], in a speech at that time, when the 1930 act was under consideration, had this to say about tariff making by the Executive, and remember that is what we have now—tariff making by the Executive. Let me read what the gentleman from North Carolina had to say at that time:

> The administrative features are subversive of our system, idea, and ideals of government; and if enacted into law will be a violation of the fundamental principles upon which it rests.
> The fathers who framed the Constitution, wisely, in my opinion, left to Congress the initiating and enacting of laws raising revenue. The flexible provision giving the President the power to raise or lower tariff rates to the amount of 50 percent renders nugatory in spirit and practical effect this provision of the Constitution.
>
> In my opinion—

This is Chairman Doughton speaking—

> we have gone a long way too far already, in the centralization of power in the Executive head of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, what a distance we have come since then! Centralization of power, once anathema to the Democratic Party, has now been adopted as their slogan.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CROWTHER. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DOUGHTON. That statement was made before we had suffered the effects of the death sentence of the Smoot-Hawley bill. We were dealing then with natural and normal conditions, but we are dealing now with desperate emergency conditions brought about by the Smoot-Hawley tariff.

Mr. CROWTHER. We have heard that word "emergency" for 7 long years. I may say to my good chairman that for 2 years under the Hawley-Smoot bill we had an improvement of 16 percent per year in our foreign trade.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Will the gentleman please put in the RECORD what President Hoover said about prosperity being just around the corner?

Mr. CROWTHER. I do not believe the gentleman will insist on my putting anything of that kind in my remarks. May I suggest to him that there is a lurking suspicion that real prosperity is still around the corner and 10,000,000 unemployed will so testify.

I again read from my distinguished chairman's speech.

> If this bill is enacted into law he will have the power of life and death over industry, all manufacturing enterprises, a complete autocratic power affecting agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, there is a word picture of warning as to what might happen. My chairman has vision. He has almost qualified as a clairvoyant. [Laughter.]

Again I quote:

> My friends, this is too dangerous and alarming to contemplate. With all this power vested in the President of the United States he becomes a colossus. It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man who ever has been, is now, or ever will be President of the United States. In fact, with all this unrestricted and unlimited power he would be in a better position to overthrow our form of government and proclaim himself king than was the first consul of France, the great Napoleon, when he overthrew the French Government and proclaimed himself emperor.
> It seems that the more power men are given the more they are obsessed with a morbid gluttony for increased power. My friends, it is time to pause and call a halt; to stop, think, look, and listen before we go over the yawning precipice just ahead of us.

Then our very distinguished Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull, with whom it was my pleasure to serve for many years on the Ways and Means Committee, and whose views regarding a protective tariff I was familiar with at all times, because when he was on the committee you could get a very decisive yes or no from him on almost any question of importance, but when he appeared before our committee in behalf of the trade treaties I noticed he had adopted the language and the manner of the diplomat, and you could never get him to say yes or no. It was always a continual reiteration of a previous statement and saying, "I think I answered that before." This reminded me of a chap who once said to me that everybody in the Diplomatic Service ought to learn to speak Spanish, because you could talk more in Spanish without saying anything than any other language in the world. [Laughter.]

Now, Secretary Hull at the time the Hawley-Smoot bill was passed was a Member of the Senate of the United States, and he was likewise terrifically disturbed about this flexible clause and this power that was going to be given to the President, and he said in the Senate:

It is clearly unsound, unwise, impracticable, subversive of the plain functions of Congress, and should be speedily repealed.

He also said this:

The proposed enlargement and broad expansion of the provisions and functions of the flexible tariff clause is astounding. It is undoubtedly unconstitutional and is violative of the functions of the American Congress. Not since the countries wrenched from an English king the power and authority to control taxation has there been a transfer of the taxing power back to the head of the Government on a basis so broad and so unlimited as is proposed in this pending bill. As has been said on former occasions, this is too much power for a bad man to have or for a good man to want.

I have often wondered just where this new policy of reciprocal-trade treaties came from. Of course, to my mind, it has always been a plain, straightforward—well, I would not say straightforward hardly; I would like to modify that—it has been a cleverly designed method of gradually reducing the rates of the Hawley-Smoot bill, coupled with a suggestion as to the maintenance of peace and courting the friendliness of the world. Of course, that is about all they could do, as they did not have the intestinal stamina to repeal the Hawley-Smoot bill. They would not have dared to go to the country with the policy that is developing under this plan.

They would not have dared to go to the country in 1936 with a declaration that they were going to reduce 42 percent of the items in the tariff bill 39.2 percent flat average right along the line. They would not have dared to do that, but they concluded they could do it by this inside, gnawing, method under the trade-treaty program, and do you know where they got that idea from? I will tell you. I found it in an old volume, dated 1911, 29 years ago.

They were considering the Canadian reciprocity treaty at that time and John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, made the minority report, and he had found in a magazine an article from which he quoted at that time, just a few lines, "In a magazine article published a few years ago, Mr. Williams, of Mississippi, now a Senator-elect from that State"—you see, in 1911, when the minority report was written on the Canadian treaty, he was Senator-elect from Mississippi, and he had written this article criticizing the tariff, and he issued this advice, and this is significant, happening so many years ago:

There is also a tariff revision by piecemeal. This is the tariff revision by reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations. Much can be done along this piecemeal line of tariff revision under a Democratic or an approximately Democratic law.

Evidently that is where it all commenced because never during any discussion that I ever heard of the tariff in the 22 years of my service, did I ever hear anybody offer any suggestion that we adopt a reciprocal-trade program as a substitute for a tariff bill, neither when the Democrats were discussing a bill or when the Republicans were discussing a bill.

Mr. Chairman, any nation is justified in establishing import duties high enough to protect its standard of living against low-wage-paying countries. Under present conditions our protection is totally inadequate. Because of this unique position of our country we cannot expect any increase in percentage of imports without untold harm to our employment situation. We can look forward, however, to an increase in dollar value of our foreign trade, but this increase will depend wholly upon our increase in domestic prosperity. Every economist and everybody who is not an economist knows, as well as everyone who is well versed in the mechanics of foreign trade, that expansion of our exports can only be obtained by a great increase in production of our goods and services for domestic purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. Our present foreign-trade policy, which brings about an increasing flow of competitive foreign products, both manufactured and farm products, does not create a proportionate increase of production of domestic goods but results in the curtailment of domestic production, and in industrial and farm-labor unemployment. No international drumbeating, conferring, and trading can start our industries in full motion and raise the country from the depths of depression.

Trade-treaty proponents have contended all along that any abandonment of the present trade-treaty program would mean going back to "isolationism" and "embargo tariffs." The answer is that it would mean nothing of the kind. We never had a policy of embargo tariffs before the program was inaugurated, and I know of no one who seriously suggests such a policy.

The Republican tariff policy does not seek and does not result in, the exclusion of foreign goods. The most that it does is simply to equalize competitive conditions in the home market as between domestic producers and low-cost foreign producers so that the foreign producer will not come into our market with any undue advantage over our own producers.

Years ago we had in our platform a provision that in addition to that, there should be a fair profit for the American producer, but we yielded that, and all that we asked during the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act was given to us by the same authorities and the same experts that supplied the evidence at the present time, and the only evidence that was given us by them and by the manufacturers was their submitted list of production costs here and in a foreign country. In case a particular duty is too high, provision is made under the so-called flexible tariff for its reduction. But they say that the flexible tariff was not used. The fact that it was not used was a tribute to its efficacy. The opportunity was there for domestic manufacturers and importers to question the appraisement and the rates. All they had to do was to apply for a Tariff Commission investigation. A House Member could offer a resolution, a Senate Member could offer a resolution for that purpose, and because it was not used they said it was not effective.

That is not so. To my mind the fact that it was not used very often, or that there were not many cases litigated under that clause, is in a sense a tribute to the fairly good judgment of the committee that wrote the bill. You remember that in the tax bill we had section 220. It was calculated to put a heavy penalty on those who did not make proper distribution of their profits, and it was argued that because section 220 had brought in so little money it was not efficacious, it was weak. In my estimation the very fact that it brought in so little money was that that 220 was a warning to big business and corporations, and resulted in very few cases developing that had to be litigated in the tax courts of the Government.

Even if the present trade treaties were entirely wiped out and the rates of the Hawley-Smoot Act were restored, this would by no means result in any embargoes.

In both the Hawley-Smoot Act and the previous Republican tariff measure, two-thirds of our imports came in free of duty. If any evidence is needed of the fact that the rates imposed under the 1930 tariff have not shut out imports, it is found in the official statistics of the Department of Commerce showing large increases of imports of items on the dutiable list, even excluding those on which concessions have been made under trade treaties.

The Hull trade agreements have made radical and sweeping tariff reductions which donate to 64 countries special advantages in the American market.

Duties have been reduced on more than one-third of all commodities produced by American farmers and industrial workers.

When the producers of other countries are transferred from war and war industry to peacetime production, this open door to the American market will spell disaster to this country.

Eighty million men are engaged in war and war industry in foreign countries, according to Secretary Hull. They are not producing great surpluses of peacetime goods, although American farmers and workers are already feeling the injury of competition by foreigners in this market. Imports are rapidly increasing.

The 80,000,000 men now engaged in war and war work will find it easy to compete with Americans. Foreign wages are lower. Few countries protect their workers by wage-hour laws, social security, workmen's compensation, unemployment compensation and other requirements that add to American production costs.

I do not know whether it is a new deal or not. As I look back at that tariff recommendation of the Honorable John Sharp Williams, and realizing that our distinguished Secretary of State belonged also to that same school of thought, it looks to me like an old deal with New Deal Santa Claus whiskers, and a full pack of gifts for our so-called good neighbors.

If the present system of trade agreements is continued it means good-bye to American control of the American market, upon which 95 percent of the country's business depends.

By transferring its tariff-making power to New Deal bureaucrats, Congress has made itself powerless to avert the disaster that is threatened. The tariff reductions under trade agreements tie the hands of Congress so long as these agreements remain in effect.

Not only are duties reduced on 1,063 competitive commodities, but pledges have been given that many articles on the free list shall not be made dutiable.

Experience warns us that the threat to American farmers and industrial workers is not an idle one. We can judge of what is to come by our experience after the World War.

Not less than 30,000,000 soldiers and war workers were turned back to peacetime production. At that time the United States had a low tariff. The war had acted as a barrier to the influx of goods into this country, just as the present war is holding back the ruinous competition that is in sight.

When the World War ended there was furious activity in foreign countries. Workers toiled 12 and 14 hours a day at poverty wages to restore the goods and wealth that had been consumed.

The surplus began to pour into the United States. Democratic low-tariff policy had opened the door.

In 1922 the Republican Party enacted the Fordney-McCumber Tariff Act and again set up a Maginot line of economic defense for American farmers and American workers.

This country's market was saved for Americans. There followed 8 years of the greatest prosperity our country has ever known.

This was only 18 years ago. Yet the plain lesson of that experience means nothing to New Deal tariff theorists. Through bureaucratic trade agreements negotiated in secret they have traded away the substance of our American market for the shadow of foreign concessions.

We were unable to find out just who did sit in in the making of these trade agreements. We had a list published of Britishers that came here, but I have never been able to find out who they were; whether they were members of a British trade association, whether any of them were manufacturers, or to what organization they did belong; but it is significant that no American representatives of trade were permitted to sit in during the making of the agreements.

The concessions granted by foreign countries open only 22 markets on better terms to Americans. Other markets are mostly in minor unimportant trading countries. But the concessions in our markets are given away not only to the 22 trade-agreement countries but to all favored nations, numbering 64.

So the Hull agreements throw open our market to the whole world.

We are asked to extend this insane program for 3 years more, so that additional agreements may be made to tear away still more of our protection to American farmers and industrial workers.

This program is, in effect, a plan to merge all the world's markets into one pool. High-standard, high-wage countries are to come down to a lower level of living and wages, on the theory that half-starved millions of peasants and toilers in backward countries will get more. Then, according to this theory, the world will be happy and remain at peace.

It is a plan to create a vast pool of world poverty, into which the welfare of Americans will be thrown. Their market is to be shared by the low-wage workers of all lands.

This plan is a blow at the wage-hour law, the social-security program, and all other laws that have been enacted to benefit American workers and farmers. American wages must sink down to the world level.

I am not willing to subject our national welfare to the vagaries of theorists who think that world peace can be maintained by pooling the world's markets and the world's wages. I want the American market saved for Americans. I want Americans to receive high wages. I want farmers to receive their full share of income.

By holding our own market for ourselves we can face the world in safety. With that immense resource at our command we can go out and get our share of world trade. Without it, our foreign trade would be nothing. When we give away our market we give away the wages of our workers and the living of our farmers.

Congress should resume its power to control tariffs. It must act before the deluge comes. Will Rogers was eternally right when he said that "We never lost a war and never won a conference." [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

During the course of this debate the membership of the House is going to hear much about the iniquities of the Hawley-Smoot law. Our political and economic ills will be laid at its door. So will the wars being fought in Europe and Asia be charged to it, and we need not be surprised if the droughts of 1934–35 were due to that measure. However, we will not be told why the new dealers have been afraid to repeal it after 7 long years.

PRESSURE AND LOGROLLING

I cannot recall in the nearly quarter of a century of my service here when there has been so much pressure and logrolling as there has been in connection with this legislation. They even brought our Ambassador to Belgium back to act as liaison officer between the White House, the State Department, and the Congress. Evidently he was not on the job the other day. I hold in my hand a clipping from West Palm Beach, Fla., dated February 17. It reads:

PERHAPS SECRETARY HULL WISHES MR. DAVIES REALLY WAS MAGICIAN

PALM BEACH, FLA., February 17.—This swanky winter resort was chuckling today over an episode in which the fancy clothes of Joseph E. Davies, special adviser in the Department of State and former American Ambassador to Russia and Belgium, almost cost him his seat at the speakers' table at a Democratic rally.

So you have started to rally? Well, it is high time. [Laughter.] Reading on—

Davies arrived at the dinner last night in a top hat and silk-lined opera cape.

Attendants at the door, after one peek at the silk skimmer and cape, mistook Davies for a magician slated to appear later, and were trying to shunt him off to the stage door when someone recognized Secretary of State Hull's new man Friday.

Undoubtedly, the gathering was looking for a magician who could pull another white rabbit out of the hat.

At the outset be it understood that those who oppose the joint resolution to extend the so-called Reciprocal Trade Act for another 3 years do so because it is not reciprocity.

In their zeal to cultivate international goodwill the new dealers have given away the cream of the American market, especially as it affects agriculture. We protest against the manner in which the law has been and is being administered. It savors of bureaucracy in its most vicious form. Those actually charged with writing the trade treaties work behind closed doors; their identity is unknown to those whose fortunes and future rest in their hands. From their handiwork there is no appeal. They are judge and jury. Incidentally, they are free-traders who believe that the more we buy from other nations the more friendly will those countries feel toward us, thus correspondingly lessening the chances for war.

We object to the policy now in effect which gives to all countries, save Germany and Australia, all the benefits that we give to the country with which we enter into an agreement, even though such countries give us no concessions in return. This is done under the so-called favored-nation clause. Russia and Japan have benefited greatly under this strange and indefensible arrangement. Our colleague from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has explained the way it works in an understandable manner. I shall at this point use his illustration: "If two neighbors trade horses, the one who is in the same fix as is Uncle Sam will have to give a horse gratis to each of his other neighbors." Such an arrangement is unsound and dangerous. Likewise, it is indefensible.

All trade agreements should be upon a barter basis. We have an agreement with Brazil. Last year the Brazilians bought from us commodities valued at $80,000,000, while in turn we bought $107,000,000 from her. Why should not Brazil be required to buy as much from us as we buy from her? No, they tell us that would not be neighborly. Maybe not, but it would be smart business. It will be recalled that George N. Peek, as good a friend as the American farmer has ever had, broke with the New Deal because of their refusal to view foreign trade in a practical manner. Mr. Peek contends that nearly all the treaties made to date have been made at the expense of the American farmer. The testimony of Louis J. Taber, master of the National Grange; F. E. Mollin, secretary, American National Live Stock Association; Charles W. Holman, National Cooperative Milk Producers Federation; J. H. Connaughton, National Association of Hot House Vegetable Growers; Dr. John Lee Coulter, a recognized economist against whom the new dealers brought their heaviest artillery without avail—one and all were of one mind. The reciprocal-trade policy of this administration had injured American agriculture. On the other hand, we had before us a number of witnesses, representing the automotive, office equipment, and other industries, in support of the program. I might at this point also call attention to the several representatives of women's organizations who spoke in support of the pending measure. Naturally so, for they represent the consuming elements of our people and probably can see no injustice in making the American farmer furnish their tables with food at below cost of production. Some apparently overlook the fact there can be no recovery in the towns and cities until agriculture has been rehabilitated.

Mr. Chairman, this is a practical matter, and each side views the subject in a practical manner. For instance, some 12 or 15 Members of the Houses appeared before us in the closing days of the hearings. One Member from Oklahoma, who came before us in support of the resolution, assured the committee that so far as agriculture and the livestock industry is concerned his people have no complaint. I was not in the least surprised to learn a few days later that this particular Member had but a few weeks previously bought nearly 1,500 head of large steers in Mexico for his ranch in Oklahoma. It is easy to understand why this gentleman is strongly in favor of keeping the bars down on cattle coming in from Canada and Mexico. Indeed, it would be strange if he took any other position, but we know that those who actually raise cattle for the market do not share his views nor approve the position he takes. Incidentally, this gentleman did protest the reduction of 50 percent in the excise tax on imported oil, so we may assume there are a few oil wells and few cattle in the gentleman's district.

Then there were several Members of Congress from Texas who came to plead that the excise tax on oil be restored. Like their colleague from Oklahoma, they were strong for the New Deal trade program, providing it did not do anything to their districts. Regardless of whether the oil tax is restored, these gentlemen and a hundred or more similarly situated will vote to extend the law for another 3 years because they know that the President yet has about 5,000 fat Government jobs to give out and friends must be taken care of no matter at whose cost. To them the tariff is a local issue and "pork" is money spent for public improvements in some other Member's district.

The hearings disclosed some very interesting incidents. For instance, it was brought out that during the hearings on the Argentina agreement, in which it was proposed to make a substantial cut in the import duty on turkeys, one member of the Ways and the Means Committee, and a strong and lusty supporter of the Roosevelt-Hull free-trade policy, hot-footed it down to the State Department to protest that turkeys must not be touched. In checking up on the imports of turkeys, I find that they are less than one one-hundredth of 1 percent, yet that member throughout the hearings sought to console witnesses appearing in opposition that where imports are less than 10 percent they have nothing to fear.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. BUCK. The Mexican cattle, however, paid full duty, did they not?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think not.

Mr. BUCK. Are you sure they came in without payment of duty?

Mr. KNUTSON. They paid the lowered rate. I cannot conceive of the gentleman going to Mexico to buy cattle when he can buy them here unless he could buy them cheaper. Of course, he gets more horns down there. [Laughter.]

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to my friend.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mexican currency has depreciated 41 percent. Consequently the American dollar will buy 41 percent more than theirs, even though we do not have a lower duty.

Mr. KNUTSON. I thank my colleague from Minnesota, who is an outstanding authority on finance. I had overlooked that point.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Is there a trade agreement with Mexico?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mexico does not need to enter into a trade agreement with us. She gets the cream without giving us anything in return. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the gentleman is well aware of the fact that there is not a single man in this House, or a married man either, for that matter, who speaks for the southwestern cattle and mohair industries who will stand here and defend this program in the name of those growers of cattle and mohair.

Mr. KNUTSON. I think the gentleman is right. Certainly no one in possession of his senses will do so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I make this statement now to give the Texas delegation, or any Member who represents that part of the State, a chance to defend the program.

Mr. KNUTSON. I am coming to the Texas delegation a little later.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. It is a fact, however, that cattle are bringing a substantially higher price today than they did in 1932 or 1933 and for several years before?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I will agree to that, but that is because world conditions have changed since that time.

Mr. SOUTH. It is further a fact, is it not——

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to go back to my friend from Oklahoma now. I will get to Texas in a few minutes.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a moment?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COFFEE of Nebraska. Is it not a fact also that we have 8,000,000 less cattle than we had in 1934?

Mr. KNUTSON. It was so testified to before the committee.

How different the attitude of the Florida delegation. The agreement with Cuba has greatly injured the early vegetable grower in that and other Southern States. He is being put out of business by peon labor in Cuba whose only wearing apparel is a breechclout and a tattered straw hat. I take off my hat to the Florida delegation. They opposed and voted against the original Reciprocal Trade Act and have consistently opposed it ever since. They know what it has done and is doing to their people. Let me suggest that the Members read the able statement of Representative PAT CANNON on the subject of early vegetables, to be found on page 2619 of the printed hearings. It is entirely free from that narrow local view so often found.

In passing let me say that service on the Ways and Means Committee is a course in human psychology such as can be had in no college or school. It brings out in burning letters human provincialism and selfishness, ambition, and avarice. What I say does not apply to those who fight for the right to enjoy American standards of living nor those who insist that all tariff duties levied shall be sufficiently high to equalize the cost of production here and abroad. Did they not raise their voice in protest against being put out of business by a trade policy conceived and nourished by a group of impractical visionaries who are in fact internationalists, they would be craven cowards unworthy of American citizenship.

It is not alone the farmer who opposes the surrender of the American market to the foreigner. The hearings disclose that organized labor, who are being displaced by the foreign workingman, often from the pauper oriental field, also bitterly oppose the policy now in force. I cite Matthew Woll, vice president, American Federation of Labor, and president of America's Wage Earners' Conference; James M. Duffy, National Brotherhood of Operative Potters.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Very briefly.

Mr. DINGELL. The gentleman will concede that Matthew Woll, under cross-examination, admitted that he was not speaking for the American labor movement.

Mr. KNUTSON. Matthew Woll stated that he was speaking for——

Mr. DINGELL. Matthew Woll.

Mr. KNUTSON. Wait a minute; for the American Wage Earners League.

Mr. DINGELL. That is not the American labor movement, I state to my friend.

Mr. KNUTSON. He voiced the feeling of a majority of the members of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. DINGELL. He was repudiated by the president of the American Federation of Labor as not speaking for the labor movement.

Mr. KNUTSON. As far as the president of the American Federation of Labor is concerned, he has been on both sides of this question.

Mr. DINGELL. If there is anyone who is spokesman for American labor, it is the president of the A. F. of L. and not Matthew Woll.

Mr. KNUTSON. I carry a card in the A. F. of L.

Mr. DINGELL. Is it in good standing?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; it is. I pay my dues.

Mr. DINGELL. All right; put it up.

Mr. KNUTSON. I try to set an example for the gentleman.

Mr. DINGELL. I challenge the statement.

Mr. KNUTSON. Read their straightforward statements telling how the workingmen of America have been robbed of their jobs by foreign competitors. Mr. Woll's statement is to be found on pages 1366 to 1395. Incidentally, I commend a study of this able and patriotic document to those college professors who believe there should be no trade barriers between nations. Theirs is a fine theory, but it cannot be made workable until all people are on the same living level. As we cannot draw the peasant, coolie, and peon up to our level, it follows that these intellectual oddities would have us descend to the lowest level now in force. Mr. Duffy's statement is to be found on pages 2136 to 2158. How any workingman, after reading statements such as these, can longer be a free trader is beyond me.

Mr. SOUTH. It is a fact, is it not, that the laboring man is receiving substantially more per hour and day now than he was in 1935 when the trade agreements were adopted?

Mr. KNUTSON. I have not gone into that phase of it.

Mr. SOUTH. I will say to the gentleman that it is a fact.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is usually correct. I have very high regard for the gentleman's intellectual honesty.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. The pottery workers in Japan get 4 cents an hour. The pottery workers in the United States get 75 cents an hour. As a result Japan supplies our market with 60 percent of its pottery.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is true; and it is equally true in many other lines.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield briefly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I want the gentleman's views on a question which has troubled me somewhat, the favored-nation clause in many of our treaties. Assuming that this Government makes a reciprocal-trade agreement with Canada, we give Canada certain concessions and in return she gives us concessions, but I understand that under the favored-nation clause Mexico has as much right to claim those benefits as Canada.

Mr. KNUTSON. That is right.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What does the United States get for extending all those benefits to Mexico under the treaty with Canada?

Mr. KNUTSON. We got a thumbing of the nose and the confiscation of American property in return, may I say.

The hearings are replete with tables. In a study of such figures it is well to bear in mind that the comparisons in imports and exports are made on a valuation basis rather than quantitative. Let us take one typical case. In 1938 we exported 500,000 barrels of hydraulic cement valued at $2.32 a barrel. During the same period we imported 1,750,000 barrels of hydraulic cement, upon which a valuation of 83 cents per barrel was placed.

So our imports seem small in comparison with our exports measured in dollars, but measured in the amount of product used the story is entirely different. Measured in dollars, 500 barrels at $2.32 look as big, if not bigger than, 1,750,000 barrels at 83 cents.

Here is another glaring example: The first 11 months in 1939 we exported 7,576,391 metal filament light bulbs at an average value of 12 cents per bulb, and during the same period we imported 84,296,063 light bulbs on which an import value of only 8 mills each was placed.

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes; briefly.

Mr. JENSEN. Can the gentleman explain to the House or enlighten us on the amount of free imports into this country?

Mr. KNUTSON. On a dollar valuation basis 64 percent of our imports come in free of all duty.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman tell us whether there is a trade agreement with Japan?

Mr. KNUTSON. I think not.

Mr. DINGELL. We are discussing trade agreements, are we not?

Mr. KNUTSON. I understand that we are also discussing countries that are getting all the benefits of the trade agreements, but give us nothing in return.

Mr. DINGELL. I am afraid the gentleman did not understand.

Mr. KNUTSON. The value of imported products is fixed at point of origin, hence any dollar comparison made is absolutely worthless as an index.

When the trade-treaty program was first proposed back in 1934 we were assured that the American farmer would be the chief beneficiary under its operation. Perhaps some of the advocates will explain to us how it comes that agricultural exports have declined over $104,000,000 while imports of competitive farm products have increased by $68,000,000 during the time that the trade-treaty program has been in effect. It should not be necessary for me to call to their attention the fact that before the trade program went into effect our export trade had increased 32 percent, or at the rate of 16 percent per year, from the 1932 low, while under the operation of the trade act the average increase in export trade has been only 13 percent per year.

Let us see what some of these trade agreements have done to American agriculture and industries partially dependent thereon:

WE IMPORT 500,000,000 POUNDS STARCH ANNUALLY

We have several large corn-processing concerns in the Middle West. In 1939 they turned 78,000,000 bushels of corn into starch. Seven thousand employees were required to handle this corn, each paid a minimum wage of $5 per day. The mills burn a pound of coal for every pound of starch made, and trains and trains are needed to haul the corn to the mills, and the coal from the mines to the mills. In 1935 we negotiated a trade agreement with the Netherlands. That country owns the Dutch East Indies. From those islands there now pours in on us nearly 500,000,000 pounds of starch annually, all of it produced by workers who get 25 cents for a long day. As each 34-pound lot imported displaces a bushel of corn one can readily figure the heavy indemnity levied on the American farmer, railroader, and miner.

The case of sugar is equally tragic. In Minnesota we have two beet-sugar factories which have been greatly restricted in their production of sugar, notwithstanding that we consume three times as much sugar as we are allowed to produce. The result is that the sugar acreage we could produce and consume at home is now given over to the production of wheat, corn, potatoes, and other farm crops of which we have a surplus. That situation also holds good in many other States. In 1938 the consumption of sugar was six and one-quarter million tons. Of this amount 1,800,000 tons came from Cuba. For every 100,000-ton increase in American production of sugar 25,000 Americans will be given jobs.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman is condeming the New Deal for taking care of their multimillionaire Wall Street satellites who are financially interested in the Cuban-sugar monopoly, such as Charles F. Taussig, at 111 Wall Street; Vincent Astor; and a host of others.

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course, the Cuban-sugar activities are largely controlled by the big international bankers of New York.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. And they are also big cogs in the New Deal political machine.

Mr. KNUTSON. They are the ones who get the benefit of everything we have done for Cuba, so far as sugar is concerned.

Continuing, that means 450,000 idle Americans could be put to work if the beet and cane growers were given a fair chance at the home market. We are told that we must buy at least one-third of our sugar requirements from Cuba, because she is such a good customer of ours. Let us examine the record. In the period 1935 to 1938 Cuban exports to the United States were $200,000,000 more than her imports. What kind of business is that?

This is another case of where we should go on a barter basis. That would be real reciprocity such as President McKinley advocated when he said:

> The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend rather to increase their employment.

To that sort of reciprocity the Republican Party has been committed for 50 or more years. Our party has also contended for tariff rates that will give reasonable protection to the American farmer, workingman, miner, and manufacturer. It is a policy under which we have enjoyed our greatest periods of prosperity and development.

When appearing before our committee Secretary Wallace said that the foundation for the present war in Europe could be ascribed to the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act, way back in 1922.

Secretary Hull thought that it was the Hawley-Smoot Act. Historians know that the Treaty of Versailles made this war inevitable. I do not agree with Secretaries Hull and Wallace that trade treaties make for peace. Assistant Secretary Grady told our committee that England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia, and other European countries have had such treaties for many years and yet Europe has been a cockpit ever since I can recall. Mr. Hull assured our committee that his trade policy is necessary to the promotion of peace. The act was passed in 1934 and extended for 3 years in 1937. When the original act was passed the world was at peace. Since it has been in effect, Bolivia and Paraguay have had a bloody war; Italy went into Ethiopia and Albania; Japan has ravished China; England, France, and Germany are again at each other's throats. Germany has absorbed Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland; and Russia's bloody hands are slowly strangling brave and honorable Finland. So much for that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

Mr. Chairman, at the close of the World War, when the Democratic Underwood tariff law was in effect, our markets were swamped with importations, especially of agricultural products. They were offered at any price in order to establish dollar credits in this country. To avert disaster it was necessary for Congress to pass the emergency tariff act which materially increased import duties. That law put a stop to the dumping.

Mr. SANDAGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly, to my good friend.

Mr. SANDAGER. The gentleman is broad-minded enough not to blame the trade agreement for that?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am simply citing this to show the absurdity of the New Deal contention that trade treaties make for peace.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly.

Mr. BUCK. Does the gentleman feel that the extension of the Trade Agreement Act will precipitate further wars?

Mr. KNUTSON. I do not think trade agreements have anything to do with it one way or the other.

Mr. BUCK. Why does the gentleman bring it up, then?

Mr. KNUTSON. I want to show how absurd the position of the two Secretaries is.

Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly.

Mr. PATRICK. The gentleman does not interpret that to mean that it makes for peace all over the world, but rather between ourselves and other nations?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am merely stating what the Secretaries said—that it would promote better feeling and peace.

The same situation is going to present itself when the present wars terminate, but then we will find that our hands are tied with all these trade agreements in effect. What will then happen?

Let me read to you some very significant statements on that phase made in this House on Friday, February 2, by the gentleman from Missouri, Chairman CANNON, a Democrat, during the debate on the agricultural appropriation bill. These remarks are to be found on page 1022 of the RECORD.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] stated as follows:

> The most serious condition that exists is the fact we are drifting straight toward the danger that followed the close of the last war. This war in Europe is going to end. That is not a matter of speculation. It is not a matter of doubt. This war is going to end. Every man on this floor remembers when the war ended in 1918. You saw wheat drop from $2.40 to 35 cents. You saw cotton drop from 20 cents to 8 cents. You saw corn drop from $1.50 to 10 cents. You saw hogs drop from $18 to $2. What precautions have you taken to avoid that situation at the end of this war? Have you done anything at all?
> Are you depending on the present system? Do you not know that since September hogs have dropped from $10 to $5? You talk about this committee cutting the agricultural appropriation bill in half. Why, the bill has cut hogs in half. When hogs dropped from $10 to $5 did wages drop? Oh, no. Wages today are higher than they were in September. Did the price of farm machinery and fertilizer drop? Oh, no. Do you know that since the 1st day of January wheat has fallen 11 cents a bushel? What do you suppose fertilizer has done, the fertilizer that grows the wheat? Wheat has dropped, as I said, 11 cents, and the fertilizer that grows this wheat has gone up $8.50.
> What is the system doing for us? If this system is failing to maintain the farmer's prices, when we have subsidies running into the millions of dollars, when we have a war over on the other side, when we have a drought in a large part of the country, when hogs are falling 50 percent and wheat is falling off 11 cents a bushel, what do you suppose is going to happen when this war closes?
> Mr. Chairman, if the Committee on Agriculture does not bring in a bill here and this do-nothing Congress adjourns and goes home, and the war closes, and farm prices go to perdition again, the farmers of this country will have a pitchfork under the coattails of a number of distinguished men who sat idly by and let it happen.
>
> I will ask my good friend the Speaker what he expects to happen to the price of cotton and corn and hogs when the war ends. What does he suggest in that contingency? Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that when this war ends the situation will be worse than before, because in 1920 we lent the people in Europe $10,000,000,000.
>
> The prosperity we enjoyed following the war and the temporary stabilized price of farm products was due to the fact that we were consuming our own money. We lent that money to be spent in the United States.
> Mr. Chairman, you can be very certain we are not going to lend them money this time. They will get no money from the United States. As a result there will be an immediate collapse of prices that will bring a terrific reaction on this country such as we have never seen before, not even in 1932. I plead with the Committee on Agriculture to at least meet and express some willingness to consider a bill. There are half a dozen measures offered—I do not know which is good and which is bad—but they ought at least to meet and consider a bill.

The new dealers take the position that Congress is not qualified to exercise its constitutional function of levying excise and tariff taxes. As Congress is now constituted that may be true, but it will not be true of future Congresses where Republicans predominate.

Mr. PATRICK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Briefly.

Mr. PATRICK. I would like to know if the gentleman is taking the position that the trade agreements can be so arranged that the end of the war can be foreseen and any drop in prices forestalled.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman believe, with all these trade agreements in effect, when the war is over and the collapse comes, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] foresees, and as we all foresee, that our hands will be tied, we will not be free to pass an emergency tariff to keep this stuff from coming in and depressing domestic prices, because these 22 trade agreements have been extended to 64 other countries.

Mr. BUCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BUCK. Was there any item mentioned in the remarks by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] which has been affected by a trade agreement?

Mr. KNUTSON. I am merely bringing out the fact that when this war closes we will not be in a position to pass emergency tariff legislation to keep our market from being flooded by countries that are bankrupt and impoverished and who will want to establish dollar credit in this country.

Mr. BUCK. I understood what the gentleman stated, but if these items have not been affected by any trade agreement, what is there to prevent the Congress from legislating in the event that this dire catastrophe occurs?

Mr. KNUTSON. How can we possibly hope to legislate to keep our markets from being flooded with competitive products when our hands are tied by 22 trade treaties that have all the effect of law? Our only salvation lies in defeating the proposal to extend the Reciprocal Trade Act for another 3 years. It we do that, we will be free to act in any emergency that may arise.

Mr. BUCK. Are those items affected by trade agreements?

Mr. KNUTSON. What items?

Mr. BUCK. The ones referred to by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. KNUTSON. I am using them as illustrations.

Mr. BUCK. Why not use items affected by the trade agreements?

Mr. KNUTSON. Because everything will be affected. You can go right down the line from A to Z and everything will be affected adversely when this war is over.

Mr. BUCK. The use of the speech by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] is just another red herring drawn across the trail.

Mr. KNUTSON. Of course, anyone who refuses to be a rubber stamp is a red herring, in the gentleman's eyes.

We were told times without number in the 1932 campaign that one of the first tasks that the Democrats would set themselves to in the event they were entrusted with the conduct of the Government, would be the repeal of the Hawley-Smoot Act. Up to date that promise has not been kept. Why? Did not Majority Leader Henry Rainey, late Speaker of the House, "let the cat out of the bag" when, during the course of the debate on the Collier bill in 1932, he said:

> Lower this tariff drastically? You (Republicans) will not do it, and we (Democrats) dare not do it with conditions as they are. We do not want this market flooded with the products of cheap labor in other countries.

For years we were told that the United States was the highest protected country in the world. That statement was false and without the least foundation. In 1928, when the Fordney-McCumber law was in effect, the United States was No. 9 among nations in the ratio of duties to imports with 13.3 percent. The United Kingdom was No. 11 with 10.9 percent.

In 1934, when the Hawley-Smoot law was in effect and before it had been tampered with, we had dropped to eleventh place with the ratio standing at 18.4 percent, whereas the United Kingdom had advanced to sixth place with a ratio of 27 percent. In 1937, the United States was thirteenth with a ratio of 15.6 percent, and the United Kingdom had advanced to fifth place with a ratio of 23 percent.

Now let us see what the picture is as it pertains to imports in relation to population. The customs duties collected per capita in United States dollars in 1937 gives $22.84 to Great Britain as against $3.56 for the United States. These figures knock into a cocked hat all contentions that the Hawley-Smoot Act was excessively high.

Why have not you new dealers kept your 1932 promises to repeal the Hawley-Smoot law? Simply because you did not dare do so. Had you kept your word, Roosevelt would have been a one-term-ite. So you proceed, through these trade agreements, to do piecemeal what you did not dare do openly and courageously. In the 22 treaties already made, you have lowered the rate on 1,012 items, of which 162 were strictly agricultural, many of the reductions by as much as 50 percent. How does that square with Mr. Roosevelt's promise made to the American farmer at Baltimore during the 1932 campaign when he said:

I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered.

In spite of that promise to the American farmer, Mr. Roosevelt has permitted the duty on 162 agricultural products to be lowered. Do you wonder that the farmers have lost confidence in him, if not their admiration for his melodious voice?

Let us see how that promise has been kept: In the Canadian trade treaty the rate on cattle weighing 700 pounds or more each was reduced from 3 cents per pound to 2 cents per pound; other cattle, from 2 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound; swine, from 2 cents per pound to 1 cent per pound; pork, fresh or chilled, but not frozen, 2½ cents per pound to 1¼ cents per pound; bacon, hams, and shoulders, and other pork, 3¼ cents per pound to 2 cents per pound; whole milk, fresh or sour, 6½ cents per gallon to 3¼ cents per gallon; dried buttermilk, 3 cents per pound to 1½ cents per pound; eggs in the shell, from 10 cents per dozen to 5 cents per dozen; rye, 15 cents per bushel to 12 cents per bushel; potato starch, from 2½ cents per pound to 1¾ cents per pound; palm-kernel oil, from 1 cent to ½ cent per pound; Cheddar cheese, from 7 cents per pound to 5 cents per pound. The rates on other cheeses are correspondingly reduced. Do you wonder that the American farmer no longer has confidence in the promises of this administration?

The Roosevelt-Hull idea of reciprocity reminds me of the chef who prepared a big stew for some gathering—half rabbit and half horse, one of each.

If this law is going to be extended, we shall insist that it be amended to permit parties aggrieved to go into court for redress. This inalienable right is now denied them. We insist that hereafter no concessions be made on products we ourselves produce in abundance; that in future negotiations due consideration be given to domestic cost of production. We demand that henceforth all agreements be openly arrived at by responsible and known agents of the Federal Government who have practical knowledge of production costs and other essential qualifications. Finally, we demand that the Congress take back into its own hands the power to act upon trade treaties made in the future before they shall become operative, and that upon their expiration treaties now in effect be rewritten along these lines. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, when a subject such as reciprocal-trade agreements has been before the Congress for 5 continuous years, it is futile to assume that votes can be changed by debate on the floor. But those who, like myself, have given much study to the program and have supported it because they sincerely believe it to be a method of promoting the national welfare welcome these periodic opportunities of publicly expressing the reasons for our support. In all frankness, I admit the majority report, filed with the resolution, covers the whole field and more ably than I could individually do, but I find satisfaction in publicly expressing my approval of the program and in urging my colleagues in the House to support it.

On February 3, 1939, I addressed the House on this subject, entitling my remarks "Foreign Trade—the Road to Peace and Prosperity." At that time I pointed out that we were dealing with an economic and not a political issue and I urged the Congress to treat it as such. I still urge that viewpoint, although recent developments give me no encouragement to believe that my Republican colleagues in the House will treat this other than as a political issue. Only last Wednesday night my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], addressing an enthusiastic Republican rally in my district, outlined the five major plans of the Republican Party "to bring about the saving of America," number four of which was "Repeal the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, so that the influx of foreign imports of a competitive character may be stopped and our agriculture may have an opportunity to get back on its feet." But not all Republicans share that view, because the Republican nominee for the Vice Presidency in 1936, Col. Frank Knox,

I am going to talk very frankly about the tariff, because I believe it is one of the major subjects upon which the Republican Party must drastically change its traditional policy. * * *

Next, let us explode the theory that one of the ways to help the farmer is to raise the tariff on farm products. The major products of American agriculture are wheat, corn, cotton, tobacco, and lard. Practically all of these products are produced by American farmers in excess of our domestic needs. Whenever this is true, the price of that commodity is fixed by world market conditions and cannot be controlled, except artificially, in this country. To attempt to help the farmer by promising him higher and higher tariffs on his products is naught but a red herring drawn across the trail to divert him from attack on the excessively high tariff rates on domestic manufactures. It is time that the farmer recognizes this for what it is. It is nothing less than an effort to keep him satisfied to pay tariff-created monopoly prices for everything he buys, and to continue to sell what he does produce at world prices. * * *

And the record of our committee hearings is filled with the comments of other distinguished Republicans to the same effect.

The tariff is undoubtedly an economic issue but lends itself to the uses of politicians because of the difficulty of the average man to understand the intricate principles of the production, distribution, and consumption of goods and services.

The economist's voice is too often a lone one on the prairie of modern mercantilism. When he tries to reason beyond the "seen" into the "unseen" he is usually condemned by the so-called practical man as a theorist. But he continues to hope that some day his point of view will be accepted and that the country will cast aside its fallacies and adopt a consistent and reasonable commercial policy.

Most important among these fallacies in the field of international economics are: First, the undue emphasis upon money as a measure of national wealth; second, the attempts of the nations of the world to attain economic self-sufficiency; and third. the undue emphasis upon exports alone.

Economic activity has a purpose. That purpose is to produce goods and services and to put them into the hands of the people. Under our arrangements, this is accomplished by the profit system, in which money is, or should be, nothing said at Pierre, S. Dak., on January 12, 1939:
more than the means to an end.

One of our twentieth century fallacies is that we place too much emphasis upon money, the means, and not enough upon the goods and services, the end. Money is a measure of wealth and is only of value as a medium by which goods and services can be obtained. We find ourselves applying to the national interest the same criteria that we erroneously apply to the individual. The more money an individual succeeds in accumulating, relative to his fellow men, the richer he is considered to be. But money is of value to the individual only because he can exchange it for things that he needs or wants. Gold cannot be eaten, as King Midas discovered to his sorrow. A man with all of the world's gold would be poor indeed unless he could exchange it for the goods and services of others. And so it is with nations. National wealth consists of food for the people to eat, clothing for them to wear, shelter to protect them from the cold, medical services, and those luxuries that make for an abundant life. The wealth of a nation is not measured by the amount of gold that is amassed. All students of economics since Adam Smith published his masterpiece, The Wealth of Nations, in the same year that our forefathers signed the Declaration of Independence, are in agreement on this.

Still we persist in the old fallacies. We continue to think in terms of money measurement instead of in terms of goods. We prefer, through export subsidies, to give our goods away instead of using them. We stress money-making rather than economic welfare. We continue to encourage exports at the expense of imports, notwithstanding the fact that we emerged from the World War in 1918 as the largest creditor nation in the world.

THE SHACKLES OF ECONOMIC SELF-SUFFICIENCY

No one would maintain that this Nation, with all of its abundant resources, its skilled engineers, and capable workers, would be better off if each of the 48 States set up prohibitive tariff walls against each other. This country is the largest free-trade area of the world. The regional specialization thereby made possible yields to us a per capita abundance of economic goods unequaled in the world's history. In fact, the cry today is that we must restrict production in order to make business profitable. How poverty-stricken our imaginations are when we maintain, with straight faces, that we have too much food, too many automobiles, and too many respectable houses.

Yet that is precisely what the nations of the world are doing. They are insulating themselves, economically, against each other and depriving themselves of the advantages of geographical specialization for the sake of making work for themselves. Nobody has yet suggested that in our public-works program we do away with shovels and provide the workers with teaspoons. But, would not that be logical if the policies that the nations of the world are following, and which our opponents seem to want us to adopt, are true; namely, that we live to work rather than work to live? Of what profit is it to France, for example, that imports of wheat are restricted when its people are forced to pay over $2 a bushel for the wheat that they consume? Are the German people made wealthy by an embargo on imports which forces them to purchase costly and inefficient substitutes? Have the Italians added to their wealth by imposing prohibitive duties on goods which they are ill-equipped to produce? There can be no virtue in an economy of scarcity. We should, if we claim to be rational men, pursue policies that make for an economy of abundance.

NEED FOR LARGER, RATHER THAN SMALLER, FOREIGN TRADE

It is axiomatic that if a nation is to sell, it must buy. If we are to export we must import. This is an age of specialization and some of our most efficient and most important industries—including agriculture—are vitally dependent upon export outlets. As Secretary Wallace has pointed out, our exports of cotton alone have normally represented the product of over 50,000,000 acres of cropland. Our exports of lard, which in 1923 accounted for 54 percent of our domestic production, declined to 17 percent in 1937. Producers of fruits, grain, tobacco, automobiles, office appliances, and industrial and agricultural machinery are also vitally interested in exports. Cut off their foreign markets and you plunge them into depression.

Our economic life is completely intermeshed. When we introduce into any important segment of it, forces that operate to reduce markets, we start the vicious spiral of unemployment. Although it is true that the United States market is the largest and best market in the world, our economic life is keyed into that of the world and reacts directly to changes in world economic conditions. When the shoe manufacturers of New England, out of fear of a flood of imports, do all they can to induce Congress to keep out the negligible imports of foreign-made shoes, they are encouraging those very forces that help to create their own economic difficulties. For, by encouraging the restriction of imports, they are helping to dry up the markets for those of our industries that are dependent upon exports. To put it briefly, it is vital to the shoe manufacturers of New England that the automobile workers of Michigan and the farmers of our great Mid-Western areas have the purchasing power with which to buy the output of their shoe factories. As pointed out in the majority report of the Ways and Means Committee, it is far better to enjoy a somewhat smaller percentage of a very large market than a larger percentage of a small market. Is it better to have 95 percent of something or 100 percent of nothing?

The arguments of the high protectionists, unfortunately, have a popular appeal because of the very use of the term "protective." That term appeals because it is not generally realized that the tariff is too frequently beneficial only to a particular producing group. But we in Congress who have the national welfare at heart, should confine ourselves to measures designed to promote the national welfare and not that of special interests. From the national point of view high tariffs are really restrictive tariffs and should be so called. For, in order to be protective to any particular group, a tariff must be restrictive of imports.

Advocates of restrictive tariffs frequently point to imports as the cause of business depressions. The truth of the matter is that imports provide a convenient scapegoat for our economic ills. Even the most casual comparison of domestic business activity and imports shows that there is a close correspondence between prosperity at home and the magnitude of our foreign trade. When times are good, both imports and exports are relatively large; when times are bad, both imports and exports are relatively small. I do not say that a large foreign trade is the cause, nor that it is the result, of enlarged domestic production. But, I do most emphatically say that healthy conditions at home and a substantial foreign trade go hand in hand.

The Republican opposition, in their attempt to minimize the repressive effects of the Smoot-Hawley Act, have given the impression that our foreign trade declined to no greater degree than did the foreign trade of other countries. But such a contention is not substantiated by the official statistics. The facts are that imports into the United States in 1932 were only 30 percent of what they had been in 1929; in all other countries—average of imports into 108 countries, excluding the United States—they were 40 percent. And, exports from the United States in 1932 were only 31 percent as large as in 1929, whereas exports from the other 108 countries were 40 percent as large.

There has also been an attempt to show that most of the decline in our imports in the depression period was occasioned by falling prices rather than by a decrease in physical volume. Again the facts are at variance with the argument of the opposition, for according to the index of physical volume of imports published regularly by the Department of Commerce, imports declined almost 40 percent between 1929 and 1932.

Restricting our foreign trade as a remedy for economic depression is analogous to resorting to exposure to a blizzard as a cure for pneumonia. The need in such times is not to restrict and reduce trade but to encourage it. Markets abroad mean markets at home. Together they mean jobs and improved national income.

TO ACCOMPLISH A LARGER FOREIGN TRADE, RECIPROCAL TARIFF REDUCTIONS ARE NECESSARY

Now I know the opposition will call all of this free-trade doctrine, and in a utopian world it would be an argument for just such a policy. But, in the world as it is, a world in which all countries are following mercantilistic gods, it is an argument for continuing a policy designed to remove excessive trade barriers. We do not advocate abolition of reasonable trade restrictions. The trade-agreements program, in the hands of this, the most powerful country economically in the world, is the one rational program in a universe of destructive ideologies. The program is not a panacea for all the world's economic ills, but it is a force operating in the right direction. If we abandon our policy of trying to break the log-jam of unreasonably restrictive international trade barriers, what is there to prevent a return to brute force? Economic self-sufficiency is the signpost leading to just that! Restricting certain imports for the sake of stimulating infant industries is one thing; prohibiting all imports is another.

We all agree that foreign countries should lower their trade barriers for the benefit of our exports. Even our Republican opponents stress that! But, just how do they expect that to be accomplished if we are unwilling to scale down some of our own prohibitive trade barriers?

Until we emerged from the World War as the world's largest creditor nation it was logical for us to have a so-called favorable balance of trade. For in those days we were heavy borrowers abroad. In order to secure the necessary foreign exchange with which to pay our debts and debt charges it was necessary that we sell more than we bought. All of that, however, was changed by the World War. It then became necessary for us to develop an import balance if we were to collect not only the war debts but other debts as well. But, we chose—deliberately and foolishly—to restrict imports, while trying with might and main to develop our export markets. Instead of lowering our tariffs we raised them, first by the Emergency Tariff Act of 1921, later by the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, and finally by the Smoot-Hawley Act of 1930. Like the dope addict who finds that one dose of the life-numbing drug leads to another, we betrayed ourselves into believing that the way out of depression was to kill off our foreign trade by jacking trade barriers higher and higher.

Let us not be blind to the fact that the Smoot-Hawley Act did not initiate us into prohibitive tariffs. We were initiated in 1921, and took our higher degrees in 1922 and 1930. The minority members of our committee seem to delight in maintaining that the Smoot-Hawley Act did not stimulate retaliation against our trade by foreign countries. They apparently want to imply that the Smoot-Hawley Act was moderate, and in doing so they let the cat out of the bag. If foreign nations heightened their tariff walls against us prior to 1930, it was because many of our rates were already prohibitive as a result of the all-too-successful efforts of Messrs. Fordney and McCumber. The Smoot-Hawley rates, coming, as they did, after the depression began, operated to freeze still further the channels of trade. Ever since the war foreigners found it difficult to penetrate this market with their wares. The act of 1930 accelerated a movement that had already begun. In that respect we agree with our Republican opponents, but they refuse to admit the extent of the acceleration.

In his book entitled "Tariff Retaliation, Repercussions of the Hawley-Smoot Bill" Joseph M. Jones, Jr., states that—

> National agitation in regard to a general tariff revision is a natural phenomenon in American history, but never has the United States in peacetime experienced such an extended and violent foreign reaction to any piece of local legislation as that attending the Tariff Act of 1930. The often-quoted formal and official protests of 33 foreign nations to the United States Government sink into insignificance beside the general protest and indignation of the populations of the principal trading nations of the world as expressed through an outraged press, mass meetings, and resolutions of trade, industrial, and labor organizations in the various countries.

His investigation, he writes, disclosed the effects of the Hawley-Smoot Act "as wide and profound, repercussions which impose urgent reflections upon our entire commercial policy." These repercussions he divides into three classes, from the immediate to the more remote, as follows:

> Firstly, widespread retaliation and discrimination against American exports; secondly, very definite effects upon the commercial policies of the principal trading nations of the world and upon the general development of the principles of commercial policy throughout the world; and, thirdly, as a result of the developments included in the first two classes, the fatal undermining of the principles upon which American tariff and commercial treaty making are based.

In its World Economic Survey, 1931–32, the Economic Intelligence Service of the League of Nations stated that—

> The whole movement (toward higher tariffs) was undoubtedly accentuated both by the alarm and resentment felt in many countries as the discussions of the new Hawley-Smoot tariff dragged on in the United States Congress from May 1929 to June 1930, and by the real effects of that tariff when it went into operation. It was followed quickly by new tariffs in many other countries, among others Canada, Cuba, Mexico, France, Italy, Spain, Australia, New Zealand. In the case of the British Dominions, higher general tariffs were accompanied by an increased measure of imperial preference, and the general idea of a more extensive system of preferential duties with the British Empire was appreciably advanced.

The League of Nations World Economic Survey for 1932–33 referred to the Tariff Act of 1930 in the following terms:

> The Hawley-Smoot tariff in the United States was the signal for an outburst of tariff-making activity in other countries, partly, at least, by way of reprisals. Extensive increases in duties were made almost immediately by Canada, Cuba, Mexico, France, Italy, Spain. During 1931 general tariff increases were announced by India, Peru, Argentina, Brazil, China, Italy, Lithuania.

Whether as reprisals against the Tariff Act of 1930 or as defensive measures for the purpose of safeguarding endangered currencies—threatened by the sudden curtailment of exports to the United States and continuing imports from, and debt payments to, the United States—the wave of foreign trade barriers which followed the enactment of the Tariff Act of 1930 clearly was caused in large part by the far-reaching effects of that law.

The new and higher rates of duty imposed under the Tariff Act of 1930 effectively cut down the volume and value of our imports of commodities from foreign countries and ipso facto reduced the purchasing power of foreigners for our export products. For this reason the Tariff Act of 1930 may be regarded as a wall which prevented the exportable products of our farms, mines, and factories from leaving the country for markets where they were desired, as well as a barrier against imports of foreign products. The foreign demand for many of our export products required more purchasing power than our dwindling imports of foreign commodities and gold imports could yield to foreigners.

Writing in 1933, Dr. Harold G. Moulton, of the Brookings Institution, summed up the effects of the Tariff Act of 1930 on United States export trade and on the commercial policies of foreign countries as follows:

> This European movement (toward higher protection) was stimulated by the alarm and resentment felt in many countries over the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act in the United States, which, after a year of discussion, was finally passed in June 1930. This act was passed at a time when the balance of economic argument was overwhelmingly against higher tariffs, particularly in the United States; it was passed over the protest of many leaders of public opinion, businessmen and professional economists alike; it was passed despite the plain threat of retaliation by many other countries—passed on the assumption that we could simultaneously still further curtail our imports, collect our debts in dollars (earned by foreigners from sales in the United States), and expand our exports to foreign countries.
> The results have been all that were anticipated by those who condemned the measure in advance.

Since 1930 foreign countries have done more than increase their tariffs. They have invented new devices to keep out imports. The very instruments of which the Republicans complain—exchange controls, quotas, and clearing and payments agreements—were inaugurated in part, at least, in retaliation against our own embargo policy. These types of import control began in 1931 or 1932, and now have spread throughout most of the civilized world.

There are at present only 5 European countries which do not have exchange restrictions; 12 Latin American countries have them, and so do a number of other important countries. All European countries, at least 5 countries of Latin America, and Canada have clearing or payments agreements, or combinations of the two. Five European countries employ import quotas as an integral part of their protectionist policy. In most cases quotas were first introduced unilaterally, and later became the subject of bilateral negotiation in trade and clearing agreements. Frequently they are plainly retaliatory.

Yet, our opponents would have us abandon our efforts to break down these barriers by abandoning the trade-agreements program—the only effective method by which we may accomplish this essential objective. They talk as though we have been lowering our tariffs unilaterally since 1934, and they minimize the reciprocal nature of the agreements now in force. The concessions that we have obtained from foreign countries have been real and numerous, as shown clearly in the record of the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee.

MOST-FAVORED-NATION POLICY ESSENTIAL

Chief Justice Hughes, when he was Republican Secretary of State back in 1923, enunciated the unconditional most-favored-nation policy for the United States. It has not been, and in truth should not be, a partisan issue. The United States steadfastly has held throughout its history to a policy of nondiscrimination in its foreign trade. What our opponents fail to realize is that there is no difference between discriminations and preferential arrangements. A preferential agreement with a foreign country is a discrimination against other countries to the extent that they are interested in the commodities on which the preferences are granted. The only exception to our policy of nonpreferential agreements has been in our arrangement with Cuba, which is explained without difficulty by the geographic and historic position of that country.

If we should embark upon a program of preferential bilateral agreements, we would be waving discrimination in the faces of all other countries. It would be a clear invitation to immediate retaliation—a step which foreign countries are only too ready and too willing to take. Under the trade-agreements program we have but recently acquired most-favored-nation treatment from Canada, France, and other countries. All these advantages the opposition would throw away in exchange for a policy that has been tried and found wanting.

Our opponents claim that under the most-favored-nation policy we give something in exchange for nothing. That is not correct. By a careful selection of commodities, concessions are granted, in each trade agreement, only on those imported products of which the country in question is the principal supplier. The foreign country, in its turn, guarantees that our products shall receive most-favored-nation treatment in its market, and that if in a subsequent agreement with some third country, it grants further tariff concessions, we shall have automatically extended to our exports the same favorable treatment. Such a policy, even from the most selfish point of view, is just good common horse sense.

Some contend that because of our most-favored-nation policy, Japan—with whom we have no trade agreement—has shared unduly in the concessions that we have granted to other countries; this is not borne out by facts. Actually, less than 3 percent of the imports from Japan enter at rates of duty that have been lowered by trade agreements. Such arguments apparently are intended to scare and to confuse the uninformed; they appeal to fear rather than to reason and fact.

STATISTICAL RESULTS OF THE PROGRAM

We in this House could go on for hours trying to prove, or disprove, by bare statistics, that the trade-agreements program has been a success or a failure. All sorts of statistics appear in the record of the hearings on this resolution to extend the Trade Agreements Act. Some of the figures presented by those opposed to the program have been juggled in such a way as to belittle the importance of the export concessions that have been obtained, and to exaggerate the importance of those that have been granted. I like to think of myself as a reasonably intelligent citizen, and I must confess that a simple, common-sense analysis of the official statistics leads me unhesitatingly to the conclusion that the agreements have been beneficial to the country.

But, before getting lost in a labyrinth of statistics, let us not lose sight of an important logical fact. Our technical experts and negotiators have worked hard—all of them—to try to scale down excessively high trade barriers. Now, would it not be strange if, in a period of economic recovery, imports and exports of those commodities that are still subject to substantial restrictions of one kind or another showed a markedly more rapid increase than those that are relatively free of restrictions? Let us not forget that under the terms of the Trade Agreements Act itself our tariff duties cannot be reduced by more than 50 percent. Moreover, in most cases reductions have been confined to those rates that have been relatively high. Why, then, should we expect that in a period of business expansion, imports of such commodities would increase much more rapidly than imports that are either free of duty or subject to only very low rates of duty? The fact that such raw materials as rubber and tin enter free of duty is a clear sign that we need them. Only necessities could ever have survived on the free list throughout the last three tariff-raising orgies of Congress. Therefore, it is only logical to expect that expanding industry at home will cause imports of these products to expand more rapidly than imports of products that are either more competitive with domestic production, or subject to high rates of duty.

Yet, in spite of this logic, which applies to exports as well as to imports, the statistical picture is extremely favorable to the program. If this is not a glowing tribute to the Yankee horse-trading sense of our negotiators, I do not know what is. It is a clear demonstration that the United States has not been "sold down the river."

I do not intend to present an elaborate statistical picture. But a recent release—January 13, 1940—by the United States Tariff Commission presents as unbiased and as clear a statistical picture as I have seen, and it shows that, speaking generally, our trade with countries with which we have negotiated trade agreements has increased substantially more rapidly than has our trade with all countries. The tabulation appears in the majority report, but I am submitting it for the RECORD because it impresses me as being about the clearest statistical summary that was presented to the committee. It shows the preagreement and postagreement trade of the United States with the principal countries with which trade agrements were made before 1937.

Agreements negotiated since then are still too recent to afford a statistical basis for comparison, and so are not included. For each of the trade-agreement countries a comparison is made between the trade of a period of at least 2 years preceding the date when the agreement went into effect and the trade during the entire period from that date through October 1939. The 10 countries covered by the tabulation accounted, in 1938, for 92 percent of the total exports from the United States to all countries with which trade agreements had been made before 1937, and for 90 percent of total imports from all such countries.

With the exception only of France and our imports from Brazil, the Netherlands, and Colombia, trade with all of the countries listed, both imports and exports, has increased more rapidly than has our trade with all countries. Furthermore, with the sole exception of Belgium, the figures show that our exports to trade-agreement countries have increased more rapidly than have our imports from those countries. Perhaps I should, in the light of this and for the sake of consistency, be critical of our negotiators for having bargained too well.

NOTE.—Includes all the principal trade-agreement countries except Switzerland and Netherlands West Indies. Export statistics of the United States show but a small fraction of the goods which actually go ultimately to Switzerland, the bulk of the export trade being conducted through third countries. Although the general provisions of the trade agreement with the Netherlands covered the Netherlands West Indies, it included no concessions on either side with respect to specific articles entering into the trade between those islands and the United States.

AGRICULTURE BENEFITED

But, this is not all. Official statistics also show that agriculture has benefited considerably from the program. Between 1935 and 1938 exports of agricultural products to trade-agreement countries increased 51 percent, whereas to all other countries they declined by about 2 percent. If cotton is eliminated from the picture, agricultural exports to trade-agreement countries increased 118 percent, and to non-trade agreement countries 47 percent. And, the decline in our exports of cotton cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be blamed on the trade-agreements program.

There is little reason for alarm because of agricultural imports when it is considered that only a small part of the imports of agricultural commodities are competitive with farm products grown in the United States. Six agricultural products not grown at all in this country; namely, rubber, coffee, cocoa beans, tea, and bananas, accounted for 45 percent of total agricultural imports in 1938. Noncompetitive agricultural imports that enter free of duty account for two-thirds of our total agricultural imports, and the remaining agricultural imports—those that are dutiable—amount to less than half of our agricultural exports. Even these imports of dutiable agricultural products have been occasioned, to a considerable extent in recent years, by droughts and crop shortages in the United States.

NUMEER OF AGRICULTURAL CONCESSIONS IN COMPARISON WITH INDUSTRIAL CONCESSIONS

In an attempt to aline agriculture against trade agreements, the opposition has stressed the number of concessions which have been made on agricultural products. They attempt to show that agriculture has been discriminated against in trade agreements by stating that the rates on from 150 to 200—Tariff Commission count, 161—agricultural products had been reduced. Anyone who has examined the record must know that many of the reductions, in effect, relate to border trade with Canada. The United States reduced the tariff on a number of Canadian imports and Canada in turn reduced the rates on our exports of similar products to that country.

Those same critics make no mention of the 800 or 900 reductions on other schedules of the Tariff Act, many of which were a positive benefit to farmers. More rates of duty were reduced in the metals and manufactures schedule—schedule 3 of the Tariff Act of 1930—alone than was the case in the agricultural products and provisions—schedule 7 of the Tariff Act of 1930. There have been 226 reductions in the duty in the metals and manufactures schedule. I have not heard those claiming to represent agriculture mention anything about these reductions and the many other reductions in the other schedules of manufactured products, which reductions have been an aid to agriculture.

FRESH APPLES

In the valley of Virginia our chief export crop is fresh apples, amounting to about 15 percent of total production. For the Eastern States, including the big apple-producing States of New York and Pennsylvania, the average is about 12 percent. Without an export market every commercial orchardist in the East faces ruin.

The most important foreign apple markets are in Europe, where a large number of concessions have been obtained in recent trade agreements. The only concession on apples granted by the United States was in the Canadian agreement. Practically all of the negligible imports of the United States originate in Canada. The following Tariff Commission tables present the picture of exports and imports and the valuable concessions obtained in 17 trade agreements.

FARMERS AS CONSUMERS

In addition to the gains to farmers as producers in expanding both the domestic and foreign markets for his products, they gain as consumers. The main purpose of a program of lowering tariffs is to encourage trade to follow broad lines of economic advantage so that there will be more goods and services available to all. Trade concessions are important in bringing industrial prices more nearly in line with farm prices. It is difficult to say how much the concessions we have granted on industrial products in trade agreements have influenced the breaking up of rigid prices of industrial products. Surely the 800 or 900 rates on industrial products which have been reduced have, at least, prevented some prices from getting further out of line.

According to the Tariff Commission the average reduction in agricultural products was 11 percent in total dutiable imports of this whole schedule, which includes fish. This compares with the reduction of 25 percent in the metals and manufactures schedule, 27 percent in the wood and manufactures schedule, and 29 percent in the papers and books schedule.

Furthermore, the proportion subject to reduced rates in the agricultural schedule, including fish, was 28 percent. This compares to 61 percent for metals and manufactures, 74 percent for wood and manufactures, 92 percent for spirits, wines, and other beverages, and 61 percent for papers and books, clearly refuting the contention that agriculture has been singled out for discriminatory treatment. The farmer as a consumer of industrial products has definitely gained in the reduction of some of the prohibitory rates of the Hawley-Smoot tariff.

In the light of all of the facts, it is difficult for me to see how any Member of this Congress who has the economic welfare of the Nation at heart, can be opposed to the proposal that the Trade Agreements Act be extended for 3 more years. Partisanship has no place in the consideration of any measure which is so vital to the welfare of our country. I urge the passage of this resolution. I do not see how it is possible for anyone who has made an unbiased and intelligent study of the question to do otherwise. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. I hope to continue this discussion for at least a few minutes without mentioning either the Democratic Party or the Republican Party. I have prepared what I believe to be a statement of the effect of the reciprocal-trade treaties on agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers of the United States are greatly concerned about their share of the foreign market. It is their contention that they are being outtraded by the industrial sections of this country in the making of reciprocal-trade treaties. There is substantial evidence that this is the case, despite protestations from the Secretary of State and others engaged in negotiating trade treaties. The best evidence in this regard is the gradual reduction of agricultural exports and the increasing of industrial exports. In 1934, the first year of the reciprocal-trade treaties, agricultural exports totaled 32.1 percent of our entire export business. This has been gradually reduced until in 1939 agriculture's share of the export trade was only 21 percent. The purchasing power of the national farm income today is three-fourths of what it was in 1910 to 1914, when the farmer was able to exchange his commodity dollar for manufactured articles on a fairly even basis.

It is interesting to study the general trend of exports from the United States. In 1938 the total value of all exports was $3,057,169,000. Of this amount, $827,546,000, or 27.1 percent, was agricultural products, leaving the balance of $2,229,623,000, or 72.9 percent, for nonagricultural or industrial exports. In the year 1939, ending December 31, we find that the total value of all exports equaled $3,123,869,000. Of this amount, $655,583,000, or 21 percent of the total, were agricultural exports, leaving the balance of $2,468,286,000, or 79 percent, for nonagricultural or industrial exports. The industrial exports in 1939 increased $238,663,000 over 1938, while the agricultural exports declined $171,963,000 during the same period. The total agricultural exports would have been reduced another 10 percent had it not been for the subsidy or indemnity payment used to sell such commodities as wheat, wheat flour, cotton, tobacco, butter, nuts, and fruits in foreign countries. The value of these commodities exported by subsidy payments total well over $65,000,000.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLSON. Not now.

It was interesting to note that during the hearings on the extension of the reciprocal-trade agreements that the State Department opposed the export of farm commodities by subsidy payment. This is no doubt another reason why agriculture feels it is not receiving its proper consideration at the hands of those who are now negotiating the reciprocal-trade treaties. One hundred and eighteen million bushels of wheat of the 1938 crop were sold for export, largely through subsidy payments averaging 30 cents per bushel. Statistics furnished by the Department of Agriculture prove that the farmer benefited to the extent of about $65,000,000 from this export, or, in other words, it meant an increase in price of about 20 cents per bushel. This increase in price was secured by a subsidy payment of $26,000,000. I ask in all sincerity, What would have been the situation of the wheat farmer in the United States had it not been for this export subsidy? In view of this great benefit to the farmer, how can the Secretary of State and others engaged in negotiating reciprocal-trade treaties oppose the subsidizing of farm exports?

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLSON. Not now. A comparison of the 4-month pre-war period, September to December 1938, in comparison with the war period of the same months during 1939 is most startling when it comes to the export of farm commodities. The farmers of the United States are going to pay a lot for the European war that is not our war. After the declaration of war England set aside all the concessions made in the reciprocal-trade agreements through quotas and the purchase of foodstuffs in other countries. This has resulted in an increase in the purchase of war supplies in the United States but a great decrease in the purchase of agricultural commodities. As a result of this there is great activity in certain industrial sections of the United States, but it is in reality only a temporary prosperity, and everyone knows there will be a serious deflation in these commodities when the war is over. The unfortunate part is that this industrial prosperity has created the impression that there is an increasing agricultural prosperity as a result of it. For the 4-month period, September 1 to December 31, 1939, there is a total gain of $217,845,000 in total exports, or a gain of 21 percent, over the same period last year. Of this amount the agricultural products gained $11,719,000, but a further analysis of the figures indicates that had it not been for greatly increased exports of cotton for war purposes, agricultural products would have shown a decline of $56,398,000. Cotton exports for the 4-month period, September 1 to December 31, 1939, were valued at $155,475,000 as compared to $87,358,000 for the same period in 1938. Tobacco, fresh and dried fruits all suffered greatly reduced volume. During this 4-month war period we exported only $21,394,000 worth of tobacco as compared to $80,406,000 during the same period in 1938. This was a loss in export of $59,012,000. Fresh fruit exports were reduced approximately 50 percent.

In the 4-month period in 1939 we exported fresh fruits valued at $9,167,000 as compared to $18,662,000 in 1938.

The reciprocal trade agreement program is inconsistent with the farm program now being administered by the Department of Agriculture. Congress has enacted legislation which provides for parity payments for agricultural products and it is my firm opinion that we will not have national prosperity in this country until agriculture receives parity prices for its products, or a fair and just share of the national income. I do not see how it will be possible for agriculture to receive either of these under the reciprocal trade agreement program. The Department of Agriculture, through the Federal Surplus Commodity Corporation, is engaged in the removal of surplus farm commodities while on the other hand the State Department, through the reciprocal-trade agreements, is reducing the import duties on the very commodities that the Department of Agriculture is distributing. During the fiscal years of 1938 and 1939 the Surplus Commodities Corporation purchased 20 different commodities and distributed them through the relief agencies of the United States. The total value of these commodities was $30,479,112. During this same period there was imported into the United States $92,298,000 worth of the same commodities. It is interesting to note that import duties were reduced on these very items through reciprocal-trade treaties. How can the farmer ever expect to secure parity under those conditions? I ask, How long should the Federal Treasury purchase these commodities by direct appropriation and then encourage their imports by trade treaties? Following is a table showing the amount of Federal surplus commodities and imports of the same for the fiscal years 1938 and 1939.

The primary purpose of the original Trade Treaty Act was to seek and regain the markets for agricultural products and for industrial products as well. It is my contention that it has failed in the first and that the longer we continue it as it is being presently administered the more agriculture will suffer. At present our Nation has reciprocal-trade treaties with all of the leading industrial nations with which it has been possible to negotiate them, and this means that further negotiations must be held and further treaties must be made with nations which are in direct competition with the American farmer. This means that future treaties will further displace the American farmer's market. I think it is generally agreed that had it not been for the strenuous objections of the agricultural sections that we would today have a treaty with Argentina, Chile, and Uruguay. The State Department says that the negotiations with Argentina are terminated. Most of us believe they would not have been terminated except for extreme pressure from the farm sections. Therefore, is it not reasonable to presume that negotiations will be entered into if the trade-treaty extension is granted? Reports from Argentina indicated that they are expecting a revival of the negotiations at a near future date.

During the past 5 years 166 strictly farm tariffs have been reduced by as much as 50 percent. The farmers of this Nation should not be forced to meet the competition of cheap land and cheap labor by the importation of competitive farm products.

It is interesting to note that the President, during his 1932 campaign, made a statement to the farmers of the Nation, which they accepted as his attitude on tariff reductions for agriculture. His statement was:

> I know of no effective excessively high tariff duties on farm products. I do not intend that such duties shall be lowered.

How can anyone justify the 166 reductions that have already been made when practically every agricultural commodity is below parity price and many of them only 50 to 60 percent of parity? The national farm organizations of the United States have made a thorough study of the trade-treaty program and are greatly concerned about its effect.

The National Grange, in its recent annual convention in Peoria, Ill., opposed extension of the Trade Treaty Act with the following resolution:

> The reciprocal trade agreements program has caused serious damage to American agriculture. It has depressed farm prices by encouraging imports of competitive products from countries where substandard labor conditions prevail. It is wrong in principle and violates the Constitution. It should not be renewed when it expires by its own limitations on June 12, 1940.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARLSON. Not now.

The American Farm Bureau Federation, which has been reported as being in favor of continuance of the program, qualified their resolution in such a way that no trade agreements would be entered into with competitive farm commodities unless they were assured a parity price level. They further urged that the act be so amended as to provide that no agreement should be consummated unless it is unanimously approved by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture. Evidently they believe, as most individual farmers believe, that agriculture has no friends in the State Department. How can they believe otherwise when the State Department opposes the payment of subsidy for the export of farm commodities? In my opinion this surplus crop removal program has given the farmer a greater direct benefit than any or all of the reciprocal-trade agreements. Following is the resolution adopted by the American Farm Bureau Federation at its annual convention in Chicago:

> In giving our support to the continuance of reciprocal-trade agreements, we renew, with increased emphasis, our demand that no agreement be consummated, the effect of which might be to force or hold domestic prices for any farm commodity below parity level. Any other course would justify the condemnation of and opposition to such agreement by all agricultural groups.
> We further insist that in the negotiation of trade agreements economic factors be given consideration equivalent to the weight accorded to the factors of diplomacy and statecraft. To this end we urge that the Reciprocal Trade Act be amended to provide that no agreement be consummated unless unanimously approved by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture.

Before concluding I want to briefly discuss the peace aspects of the trade-treaty program and the farmer. There is no group of citizens in the United States that is more concerned about maintaining our peace and our neutrality than the farmer. His close touch with nature itself makes it natural for him to favor not only domestic harmony but also peace for the entire world. He is willing to sacrifice, if necessary, for this cause. On the other hand, I do not believe that he should be expected to pay the price that the trade-treaty program is exacting for an illusory peace. The trade treaty may have for its altruistic purpose the establishment of world peace through the reduction in trade tariffs. It may be a worthy purpose, but when we adopt it we must keep in mind that in so doing we must also accept the living conditions, wage standards, and competition of the peasants who produce competitive farm products. I for one do not believe it would justify the cost. Practically the entire world is embroiled in war, and most all of the late wars have been declared since the trade-treaty program was enacted in 1934. This is positive proof to me that we should not base our peace hopes on the trade-treaty program. We are dealing with the other nations of the world which are forced to adopt hard, realistic principles of trade, and I do not believe we can expect them to be swayed by gratuities in the form of tariff reductions. We are dealing with shrewd international traders and if we are not to lose our best market—namely, the American market—we must approach this subject from the same basis.

Mr. Chairman, I want to urge that no reduction be permitted on foreign farm products when the price of the competitive American product is below parity. Let us give the American farmer the benefit of the American market.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL].

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me for a moment or two?

Mr. DINGELL. Certainly.

Mr. BUCK. To correct the Record. I failed to obtain consent of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON] to make an interrogatory on the question of the purchase of Federal surplus commodity goods. He read a portion of the minority report in which he referred to a list of 20 commodities on which the tariffs had been reduced, amounting to $30,000,000, while in the same period there were imported into the United States $92,000,000 of those same commodities.

The question of purchases by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is certainly one which demands more attention than the minority spent upon it, although they say that, "Perhaps the most preposterous conflict between the trade-treaty program and the farm program." The reason for the minority not continuing with the analysis of this question is undoubtedly due to the fact that their argument loses all its validity when the details are examined. Let us look at some of these details.

The minority states that—

> During the fiscal years 1938 and 1939 there was spent on surplus removal operations in these commodities (20 commodities on which tariffs have been reduced under trade treaties) $30,479,112, while during the same period there were imported into the United States $92,298,000 worth of these same commodities from abroad. Presumably if the import duties on these commodities had not been reduced, a large part of the money spent out of the Treasury for surplus removal operations could have been saved.

Now, let us see what makes up these totals. Nearly eighty-four million, or over 90 percent of the ninety-two millions worth of imports, were of two items: Cheese, $23,584,000, and fish, $60,259,000. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation spent only $741,177 on purchases of these two items. If there had been a complete embargo on fish and cheese, 90 percent of the imports of 20 commodities mentioned would have been kept out. Only 2.5 percent of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases presumably would have been averted, although purchases of both products were due to temporary emergency conditions during the fiscal year 1937–38 and were not repeated in the fiscal year 1938–39.

Now, let us see what makes up the total of $30,479,112 of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases. The largest purchases were of apples $4,978,816, white or Irish potatoes $4,286,457, and fluid milk $4,229,949, a total of $13,495,222. Imports of these three products totaled only $1,539,000, or a little over 10 percent of Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases of them. But now for the joker: $1,342,000 worth of the potato imports were of certified seed potatoes, and the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation bought no certified seed potatoes. Therefore, the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation expenditure of $13,495,222 on apples, potatoes, and milk could not, by any stretch of the imagination, be reduced by more than $197,000, or less than 1 percent, if imports of these three products had been kept out. Now, at the same time we were importing $197,000 worth of these products we were exporting $32,995,000 of them, or more than Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation's combined purchases of all 20 products. Surely the minority would grant that the trade-agreements program which seeks to safeguard in benefiting more than $32,995,000 worth of our export trade in these three commodities was not greatly increasing the new surplus by allowing $197,000 worth of imports to trickle in.

The only other commodities of which Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases amounted to more than a million dollars are rice, wheat cereal, raisins, canned peas, grapefruit, cabbage, and eggs. Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases of these seven commodities totaled $14,147,465 in the 2 fiscal years. Imports amounted to only $2,820,000, but exports, which were greater than imports for every one of these products, were more than twice as great as imports and Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation purchases combined, being valued at $38,802,000. Of the total of $2,820,000 worth of these imports, broken rice accounted for $2,294,000, or more than 80 percent. The only duty reduction on rice was that granted in the agreement with the Netherlands on finely screened broken rice, known as brewer's rice. It is but little used for human food. The rice purchased by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation could not have been substituted for the imported product on which a reduction in duty was granted except at a prohibitive price. The only concession on grapes was a binding of the duty on hothouse grapes, a luxury product. Canned peas also fall into the luxury category. The duty reduction on fresh grapefruit is limited to 2 months of the year before our marketing season begins, and the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation made no purchases during these months. Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation likewise made no purchases of wheat cereal of a type on which the duty reduction was made. The raisins on which a duty reduction was granted of a special type imported for the bakery industry. United States imports are insignificant when compared with exports or domestic production of raisins. In the 2 fiscal years 1938 and 1939 our exports were valued at more than $15,000,000 while imports were valued at only $92,000. Exports of eggs also greatly exceeded imports. No reductions were made on wool, corn, cotton, fresh beef, or wheat for human consumption.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I have a 40-minute speech to deliver in 30 minutes, I will not be able to yield until I shall have concluded my remarks.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I come from the great industrial and automobile-producing State of Michigan, and particularly because I reside in and represent a substantial district within the capital of the Nation's automobile industry, there will be very little surprise among the Members of the House when it is known that I am enthusiastically and wholeheartedly for the bill before the Committee, which provides for the extension of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

I am not, however, provincial or chauvinistic enough to support the bill just because the administration proposes it or because the benefits affect alone the auto industry. If the benefits accruing to the auto industry were centered within and confined solely to manufacturers and workers engaged in the production of automobiles and to the exclusion from benefit of all others, or if such benefits were gained at the expense or sacrifice of the other industries and farmers, I could well find myself on the side of the opposition. The automobile industry is America's No. 1 industry. It is centered in the greatest and most intensely industrialized area in the world. At all times the production of automobiles is a gage of the prosperity of our Nation. In depression we all look to its early revival of activity leading to prosperity. In prosperous times we all look to it as a stimulant and stabilizer of our economy. This great industrial giant touches and affects everything and everybody. The products of the farm, the mine, mill, smelter, and manufacturer in every city, county, and State of the Union are dependent upon it for a very substantial outlet; nor are the producers of commodities alone the beneficiaries of automobile production. Finance, sales, and service business rises or falls with this industrial marvel.

I have repeatedly been reminded that the American farmer is the biggest proportionate buyer of the automobile output, and that is to be conceded without any argument from me; but I want to remind those who advance this line of reasoning in opposition to the extension of the trade agreements that the best customer of the American farmer is the worker in the great industrial producing centers of the Nation. And, taking the ratio of farm and urban population as a basis for the comparison as to who is the best customer for the other, we will find that the argument and comparison favors the urban customer in the ratio of about 3 to 1.

We are all of one mind in saying that the American market for the farmer and the industrial worker is the most important and the one to protect and enlarge upon, and that is what the administration is trying to do through trade agreements. The farmer cares not if he sells his grain, hogs, cattle, beans, or furs as an export. What he wants to do is to sell his products to somebody. If an agreement can be made that will stimulate the automobile manufacturer and our industries to rise to great heights of production, the surplus of farm products will go into the stomachs of our factory workers, who will pay in hard, cold-rolled American dollars for what they buy. Our American workers are the best eaters—yes; by comparison they are the epicures among the workers of the world.

A splendid and well-qualified witness in the person of R. W. Gifford, chairman of the foreign trade committee of the Detroit Board of Commerce, appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and made a most powerful and lucid statement in behalf of the trade agreements. His testimony is not only forceful, but unimpeachable because of its thoroughness and fairness to all concerned. He treats and gives full consideration to the farmer equity in the proposed legislation. I refer you to his testimony on page 1534 of the printed hearings. It is well worth reading.

It is not my purpose to repeat again the overwhelming evidence presented at those hearings which reaffirm my belief in the desirability of continuing this legislation. Other members of this Committee already have reviewed the major features of the testimony and I will touch upon them only insofar as they bear upon the questions to which I address myself.

As pointed out by the spokesman for the Detroit Board of Commerce in the statement before the committee, probably no area in the country has more real interest in the success of the trade-agreements program than Detroit and Michigan. That foreign trade is important to us is indicated by the fact that the Detroit industrial area is the largest producer of manufactured goods for exportation in the United States. According to testimony, about 800 plants in Michigan are engaged in exports. Six hundred of these plants are listed in the hearings. I will not bore you with the reading of this list, but I desire, nevertheless, to insert the names of these companies and their locations in the RECORD. I will also put into the RECORD three brief, though important, tables.

[4] Estimate.

Mr. GIFFORD. In addition to that chart, I have a list for the record, in case it may be questioned, of the 600 Michigan plants who are actively engaged in the export business, and incidentally I think that that can be increased another couple of hundred because they did not even have us on the list, and we have about five factories in the State of Michigan. So, judging from that fact, I think that there are probably many others.

Mr. COOPER. You can submit that also.

One out of every $7 spent in this industrialized area is derived from foreign trade.

Although Michigan derives the major portion of its wealth from its highly industrialized production, agriculture also is important in the State's total economy. Canned fruits and vegetables produced by Michigan farmers find important outlets abroad. The Michigan farmer has a stake in the international trade, not only to the extent that his own production moves directly into foreign trade, but also to the extent that the goods made for export by industry provide its workers with the purchasing power which is so essential to the farmers' market.

Michigan's agricultural industry is a large contributing factor in Michigan's total economy. Our agricultural production is greatly diversified, consisting chiefly of grain, livestock, fruits, dried beans, vegetables, and dairy products. To be sure, only the canned fruits and vegetables move into the export trade, but Detroit, a city which is so largely dependent upon exports, alone absorbs nearly half of the Michigan farmers' produce. In this connection, I should like to refer to several of the statements made by Mr. Gifford, who said to the committee:

As near as I can tell, I am the only person who has appeared before this committee as yet who has been actively on the firing line in the export business. In the last 30 years, since I started on my first trip abroad, I have spent 18 of those years living in foreign countries. I have covered all parts of the world many times except the Far East, and the war stopped that. There have been many questions and many statements made that I think could have been answered and answered quickly and easily by someone who is in the export business. * * *

I have listened here for several days to the discussions, and frankly most of it seems to me to be entirely theoretical. It is being approached from an academic angle as to the theory of the export business. Actually, I think, if these same men, had to get out and try and sell merchandise in the foreign market they would take a different slant. I have heard the argument made yesterday, I think by an eminent writer, Mr. Peek, that there seemed to be any number of ways in which this could be handled. At one time apparently in his book he felt that it ought to be put in the hands of a committee of responsible citizens.

Mr. WOODRUFF. He still believes that.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would like to know what a group of responsible citizens would be, unless he picked them himself. If I pick them

I would believe that they would be responsible. At the present time he says that the present bunch are not responsible. Maybe they are not, but my experience with them has sold me and has sold a good many manufacturers on the fact that they are serious and conscientious in handling it.

I can think of no testimony which we heard which so adequately answers all the criticism of the opposition as does the statement by this witness. Mr. Gifford went on to give us page, sentence, paragraph, and verse of his experience and that of innumerable other manufacturers with the operation of this program not only as it applies to exports but also as it affects imports into the United States.

I am convinced that the trade-agreements program has been a great benefit to the automotive industry and, since the manufacture of automobiles affects the economy of every State, every county, every city, and every hamlet in our Nation, I am sure that the benefit which the trade-agreements program has brought to that great industry has spread its blessing throughout all phases of our economic life.

I am also equally convinced that the operations of this program have not injured any segment of our farm or industrial life. To be sure, the operation of this program may have resulted in occasional hardships or temporary dislocation for isolated groups here and there; but I feel certain that once the momentary difficulty of the adjustment necessitated by tariff change is passed that these people will reap and have had benefits far greater than that which they could have enjoyed had the status quo been maintained.

Let us examine for a moment the importance of the foreign market to the American auto industry. In normal times 10 percent to 15 percent of the automobiles produced in the United States are sold abroad. In proportion to the total production, foreign outlets are much more important to the manufacturers of trucks, who sell upward of 25 percent of their output outside the United States, as compared with the 10 percent to 15 percent sold by the makers of passenger vehicles.

In 1929, the peak year of automotive exports, $539,300,000 of American automobiles were sold abroad. By 1933 this had dropped to the disastrously low figure of $90,600,000. In the years in which we have seen the trade-agreements program in operation automobile exports have steadily climbed and in 1937 reached the high level of $346,900,000. Although 1939 was not as good a year as 1937, it none the less accounted for exports valued at $253,700,000.

I have already inserted in the committee hearings a list of the concessions which have been obtained for the automobile manufacturer and the exports under these concessions in 1937. I will not bore you with a repetition of this list, but I do want to point out to you that 19 of the 20 trade agreements now in effect cover automotive products and that in 1937 these concessions applied to some 90 percent of all of the exports in that year. The indirect effect of this upon our national economy can be best visualized if we examine the proportion of the national consumption of our leading raw materials which go into the making of automobiles.

The automotive industry in 1938 consumed the following proportion of total United States consumption:

In addition, the automobile industry was the principal consumer of the following materials which, although not directly produced in the United States, nonetheless provide a substantial amount of industry and employment here:

	Percent
Rubber	80
Tin	9
Nickel	29

The relative importance of the automotive industry as a factor in our broad national economy can best be demonstrated by reference to the industry's employment and pay roll. In the year which most of us think of as the peak—1929—the automotive industry employed 448,000 workers and paid them $14,682,000 per week. In the peak year of the industry—which was 1937, incidentally—employment averaged 517,000 workers, and their weekly pay roll was $15,659,000. Figures for 1939 are not yet available, but the indications are that they will closely approach the 1937 level.

Again I repeat that I would not support the trade-agreements program if it had been a benefit only to the automotive industry, because I realize that, even though the automobile industry is important to this country, it is still but one part of the economy affecting the well-being of these United States. In this respect it is interesting to note the position taken by the Automobile Manufacturers' Association. In their statement before the committee they said:

We are not only concerned, however, with the effect of this act on our foreign business. Between 85 and 90 percent of the cars and trucks made in this country are sold here, and between 10 and 15 percent are exported.

We would not endorse trade agreements if it were thought they jeopardized or adversely affected the home market, where such a preponderance of our production is sold. During recent weeks fear has been expressed by some opposed to this act that increased imports will be harmful to the welfare of the American farmer. We do not share this belief. As a group, the farmers of this country are our best customers, and we are certainly mindful of those who buy such a large share of our products. To the contrary, we believe that the duty reductions that have been made have had no serious effect on the agricultural industry, while increased exports have widened the market for farm products.

Nothing has strengthened me in my support of this program so much as the failure of the opposition to demonstrate any adequate basis for their complaint. Let me touch briefly upon three subjects which have been the cause of much of the vocal criticism of the program and to point out a few of the most obvious weaknesses of these arguments. The subjects to which I refer are cattle, silver fox furs, and beans.

There has been much wailing and complaining about the injuries sustained by the cattle producers and to hear some of the testimony you would think the situation is hopeless. I am not an expert but I know an expert when I see and hear one. This House has among its Members several cattlemen, none more able or qualified to speak for these producers than our colleague from Oklahoma, PHIL FERGUSON. I am willing to rest my case on his testimony. Let us see what he has to say about the matter:

Any informed cattleman knows that the industry has not suffered due to the reciprocal-trade treaties. The figures reported by Mr. GEARHART are a sample of the misinformation that has gone out to the country; 57,000 cattle imported in 1934, and he compares that with some six or seven hundred thousand imported in 1939.

I can say to the committee that if the domestic price of cattle had been the same in 1939 that it was in 1934 there would have been no increase in imports. They simply could not have paid the existing tariff under the reciprocal-trade treaties and come into this country. We still have a very effective protective tariff on cattle.

I might add that the cattle industry has been so much harmed by the imports of cattle under trade agreements that it is the only item among our agriculture products which is now enjoying parity prices, while other segments of our farm production on which rates have not been reduced by trade agreements are only able to yield some 75 percent or less of their parity price.

Because it is a matter of primary importance to the farmers of my State and because Michigan is the largest producer in the country, I would like to devote a moment or two to the question of dried beans. Let me say first, that dried beans have not been included in any trade agreements but the commodity was one of those listed for consideration in the proposal for a trade agreement with Chile.

Let me say first that from what I have seen of the operation of the trade-agreements procedure and from the information submitted by witnesses at our hearings, I am convinced that if there was any likelihood that a reduction in the rate of duty on dried beans would harm our farmers, that no such reduction would be made. I will nonetheless cite a few pertinent factors affecting any consideration bearing upon the commodity.

Production of beans in the United States has increased steadily in recent years. Production which ranged from nine to eleven million bags a year in the early twenties, increased to ten to twelve million bags per annum in the latter part of the decade, and since 1930 has ranged from eleven to fifteen and one-half million bags a year. Production which amounted to 11.4 million in 1936 jumped to 14.6 million in 1937 and was followed by the second largest crop on record in 1938, of 15.3 million bags. The estimated production for 1939 was 14,000,000 bags. Imports have ranged from less than 1 to 3 percent of domestic production. Although exports have usually been much less than 1 percent of domestic production, in 1938 exports actually exceeded imports. The present drag on the bean market is centered in the 3,500,000-bag surplus. The testimony relating to beans as advanced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] does not stand up, it is not worth the printing space in the RECORD. He was equally as forceful and trustworthy when he argued about imports of cabbage even after he added sauerkraut.

We have heard frequent references to the existence of a large surplus of beans, with an attempt to establish by implication that this results from excess importations. I need not discuss the fallacy of such statements. The figures themselves adequately demonstrate that if there is any surplus, it cannot be due to imports, but is directly the result of the increased production and successive bumper crops produced by our own farmers.

The present duty on beans is 3 cents per pound, or $3 per bag. Insurance, commissions, and other expenses add about $1 a bag to the cost of foreign beans landed in the United States. Thus, even if beans were obtained gratuitously abroad, the price in the United States would have to be more than $4 per hundredweight before it would pay anyone to bring them into this country. In the brief against any reduction in the rate of duty on beans which was submitted by the Michigan Bean Growers and introduced into the RECORD by my colleague from Michigan, Mr. WOODRUFF, the farm prices shown have been $4 and more in only two of the last 10 years. In 1937, 1938, and 1939, the prices have averaged $2.50 per hundred and less. Even with the impetus given commodity prices by the outbreak of the present hostilities in Europe, the highest price for beans reached on September 15, 1939, was but $3.50 per hundred.

I am wondering how at these prices beans, which must bear shipping and other handling expenses of $1 per hundred plus a duty of $3 per hundred, or even if the duty were reduced by the full 50 percent allowed by the law, $1.50 per hundred, how anyone thinks that foreign beans could be brought into this country and sold at prices which would be competitive to our farmers.

The implication advanced by those who would abrogate trade agreements that bean prices were affected by the mere fact that they were listed for consideration with another nation or that the relatively unimportant concession made to Cuba on fresh lima beans and imported in December through May is entirely groundless. Anyone who can do a little simple arithmetic can see how absurd it would be to anticipate imports of dried beans unless the prices were so high in this market that they not only attracted imports, but also brought great satisfaction to the bean producers of the United States.

The overwhelming weight of the evidence offered before the committee is in favor of the continuance of the policy of trade agreements and the extension of the act. The opposition failed to make out a case, not because of the lack of ability on the part of those who appeared, but because there was an insufficiency of substance to sustain their position. The sentiment of the people throughout the Nation, and they are well informed, make you no mistake about that, is in line with the preponderance of the evidence and for the extension of the act.

Some of the testimony in opposition was painfully strained, twisted, and stretched. In one instance as regards furs, in spite of the endorsement given by the accredited and well-informed spokesman for the fox and fur producers, adverse testimony predicated upon bias and misrepresentation was given the committee, which, when analyzed, proved to be stretched to the sixth dimension of baselessness.

Let me quote briefly from the statement of Maurice Fitzsimmons, the spokesman for 90 percent of the fur producers of America, let us see what he has to say about the trade-agreement policy:

> We feel rather keenly in the fur industry about this reciprocal trade agreement program because the industry, starting with the outbreak of the European war, was threatened with a very serious crisis.
>
> * * * * * * *
>
> Our breeders were going to go broke if they continued producing silver fox and if all of the European pelts were dumped into this country.
> A tariff would not help us one iota. * * * In a case like that silver-fox furs might be worth $2 or $3 in the European market * * * a 50-percent or 100-percent tariff would mean nothing on that when we have a cost of production in America, as I said before, of about $26 to $28 per pelt.
> Finally, we turned to the reciprocal-trade agreements, and there we found a cooperative group of men * * * we sat around the table and discussed with them as to what would be the logical way out; and that through the power of the elasticity of the trade agreements were able to enact a quota.
>
> Now to me that is important and it seems to me imperative that you continue on the statute books of these United States an elastic trade law that can meet emergencies. * * *
>
> I hope that you are going to continue to have that type of law on the statute books of these United States so that we can continue to go ahead with confidence.
> We had another sale in January, at which time the price was up 43 percent over December levels, and we had a 95-percent sale. I think that in itself shows what happened to the fur trade, to the fur buyers, and to the producers, as a result of this quota that was set up through the reciprocal trade agreement program.

When the country was for the greater part agricultural, to that extent we were dependent upon the farmer for prosperity. Now that the United States is three-fourths or more industrial, the reverse is true. The farm producer at no time in recent years lost the major part of his export market and always retained unimpaired the home market with perhaps a slight fluctuation. Certainly that is true as it applies to the major commodities, such as cattle, hogs, sheep, corn, wheat, rye, and other grains, as well as fruits, vegetables, and dairy products. In these and many other instances, the American market has been invulnerable to foreign penetration and has been held to our farmers to the extent of 95 to 99½ percent.

Manufacturing industries fared perhaps as well in the home market, but the export markets have in many instances fallen off as high as 90 percent of previous exports. That is what hurt the American farmer and his business. When you cripple industry with its vast buying power, the suffering affects not alone the industries, but also the farmer and the whole Nation.

Remember, always, America today is three-fourths or more industrial, urban, and one-fourth or less rural and agricultural. If the farm producer retains 90 percent or more of his valuable home market and industry loses a great percentage of its foreign market, is it not reasonable to assume that a prop for industry will be a prop for the farmer? I sincerely believe that is the case.

What I tried to show here, Mr. Chairman, is that the trade agreements are of much benefit to all the people and to all lines of business in every State in the Union, including the manufacturer, the farmer, the merchant, the banker, and the rail- and steamship-transportation operators; and that not only were the industries and farm producers for whom concessions were obtained under the act directly benefited but through them, as for example through the auto industry, many other producers in the city and the farm reaped indirect benefits.

The evidence proves conclusively that prosperity in the auto industry resulting from trade agreements contributes to the prosperity of the farmer whether he produces hogs, cattle, grain, or even silver-fox furs. Our auto workers when employed eat well, dress well, and even buy silver-fox furs for their wives and daughters.

I believe I made it clear, too, that the stimulating effect of the concessions obtained for farmers and fruit growers has been felt by the manufacturers and particularly the automobile manufacturers.

I hope I may have contributed in a small measure something of value toward convincing some of the Members regarding the soundness of the trade agreements as an economical instrumentality which is really workable and ought to be continued. [Applause.]

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, the noted economist Mr. Roger W. Babson recently declared:

The reciprocal-trade program has been a truly bright spot of the New Deal. In his quiet but firm way Secretary Hull has fought harder for peace in this decade than any other man alive. He is a tower of strength, vision, and unselfishness. His program has increased our exports to countries with whom we have completed agreements by 60 percent, while our exports to those countries with which we have not bargained have expanded less than 40 percent. Moreover, our imports from treaty nations have not increased any faster than with nontreaty nations. This, in a nutshell, tells the effectiveness of the program, its aid to jobs and industry.

Mr. Babson wrote other words of wisdom, as follows:

The G. O. P. needs campaign ammunition and they will make the most of decrying these trade pacts. They claim, for instance, that the program permits an excessive influx of farm products—$800,000,000 worth in 1939. But Secretary Hull points out that $530,000,000 of this was coffee, rubber, silk, cocoa, bananas, which have always been admitted duty-free.

And again in the statement:

The importance of world trade has never been fully realized by most people. Foreign commerce is the keystone of world prosperity and peace. Our overseas markets in good times absorbed only 10 percent of our total output, but that 10 percent was a vital 10 percent. Half of our cotton crop, for instance, was sold abroad. Think of the importance of cotton to United States prosperity.

And in defense of Secretary Hull, he wrote:

Secretary Hull (a former Senator) knew that the only way to lower tariffs and increase employment as a whole would be a reduction program which excused constituent-conscious Congressmen from voting to ratify it. Hence, the State Department's trade program came into being.

To separate foreign trade from politics—

Ran an editorial in the Star Free Press (independent), Ventura, Calif.—

Shades of Willis Hawley and Reed Smoot. If ever politics sired a vampire to suck the lifeblood out of our foreign trade, the Hawley-Smoot tariff of 1930 was it. The Hull program, far from being bound up in politics, was designed to rid our foreign trade of the curse of politically logrolled tariff barriers behind which our commerce had languished. Many of the roots of the present war are traceable to the tariff walls which crisscrossed post-Versailles Europe. If we retreat to Hawley-Smootism, as Senators MCNARY, CAPPER, and others seem to desire, we may very well be putting down the roots of our participation in this or another war. It would mean crawling into the shell of economic nationalism, with everything that phrase implies in lowered living standards, regimentation of agriculture and industry, and international animosity. * * * Conceivably there have been inequities involving particular farm products, and if so the farmer is justified in seeking redress. But if he has a vivid recollection of the early 1930's—as what farmer has not—surely he will hesitate before being sold that bill of shoddy goods again.

Senator CAPPER is reported to have once said in the Senate:

Our experience in writing tariff legislation has been discouraging. Trading between groups and sections is inevitable. Logrolling is inevitable, and in most pernicious form. We do not write a national tariff law. We join together through various unholy alliances and combinations a potpourri of hodgepodge, sectional and local tariff rates which often add to our troubles and increase world misery.

Now he wants to go back to it.

But reciprocal-trade agreements negotiated under the Trade Agreements Act of 1934 have, beyond doubt, been of advantage to the State of Kansas and to agriculture, the principal industry of the State. Renewal of the authority of the President to negotiate these agreements offers further valuable benefits. Failure to renew this authorization, on the other hand, means definite and serious loss and danger to the interests of Kansas, both farmers and others.

While important reductions in foreign barriers against exports of commodities grown on Kansas farms have been obtained through the agreements, these reductions are not the only, or perhaps even the most important, advantages of the program to Kansas. Nevertheless it is a fact that through trade agreements, 11 countries have reduced their barriers against American wheat and wheat flour. Great Britain removed, entirely, her preferential tariff of 6 cents a bushel on American wheat, and Canada reduced her duty. Nine other countries made concessions of various sorts on these products.

Kansas corn-hog farmers have had their export markets for pork products and lard improved by agreements with 17 countries, including our most important foreign customers for these products. These concessions cover all forms of hog products—lard, hams, bacon, and fresh and frozen pork—and beef and veal. They have helped to sustain and enlarge foreign markets for American meat products and have provided jobs for men in Kansas packing plants and on Kansas railroads.

Many factors other than trade agreements have influenced our international trade since the Trade Agreements Act was passed, and no statistical analysis can show exactly and conclusively, commodity by commodity and agreement by agreement, just what part each trade agreement has played. There have been wars and preparations for war, droughts and bumper crops, fluctuations in industrial and business activity, both in this country and abroad. They have all had their effects. But plain common sense shows that when foreign restrictions on exports of American products are reduced or removed, the foreign market for these products is better than it would have been if the trade-agreements program had not removed the obstacles.

Notwithstanding the powerful adverse factors that have been operating, and the difficulty of determining exactly the direct effect of trade agreements, there is plenty of statistical evidence to show that the agreements have been enlarging and supporting United States foreign trade. Between the fiscal year ended June 30, 1936, and that ended June 30, 1939, United States exports of all commodities to trade-agreement countries increased more than two and one-half times as much as did exports to nonagreement countries.

In that period, United States exports of farm products to trade-agreement countries increased 15 percent, while exports of farm products to nonagreement countries declined 19 percent. United States imports of all commodities from trade-agreement countries declined, in the years under comparison, by 2 percent; imports from nonagreement countries declined four times as much.

Nor have the advantages of foreign concessions on American exports been limited, as far as Kansas is concerned, to those on exports of farm products. Kansas grows crops and produces livestock to feed Americans as well as to feed foreigners. Increased exports of American industrial goods—automobiles, machinery, iron and steel products, typewriters, and dozens of other nonagricultural products on which concessions have been obtained through the trade agreements—mean more American industrial workers with money to buy beef, pork, dairy products, and many other things which come from the soil of Kansas. Not the least important customers of the Kansas farmer are railroad workers, of whom there are thousands in Kansas. It is sufficiently obvious that goods moving in either interstate or international trade mean more freight traffic and more men on railroad pay rolls able to buy the products of Kansas farms.

In return for the concessions that have been obtained for American exports, including those produced in Kansas, the United States has made adjustments in its own tariffs on certain products imported from other countries. It is an all-too-prevalent delusion that every such an adjustment is harmful to Americans and deprives American producers of some share of their domestic market. Tariff reductions under the trade-agreements program are made only after the most careful study by men from the Tariff Commission and from the Departments of Agriculture, Commerce, and State to determine that they will not be harmful to American producers. When necessary these reductions are hedged about with safeguards and restrictions to prevent their resulting in depressed prices to American producers.

The trade-agreements program has not deprived the American farmer of any of his share of the domestic market for farm goods which he can produce, nor has it lowered his prices and income from products on which tariffs have been reduced. In 1929, when farm cash income in the United States was up to eleven and one-fourth billion dollars, the American farmer supplied 90 percent of the domestic market for farm products. In 1933, the last full year before the inauguration of the trade-agreements program, he supplied 93 percent of that market, but received a cash income of only five and one-fourth billion dollars. In 1938 he still supplied 93 percent of the domestic market and received a cash income of nearly seven and three-fourths billion dollars.

His share of the domestic market is not so important to the American farmer as how big and how profitable to him that market is, and how much income he gets from supplying it. Because the trade-agreements program stimulates industrial, transportation, and business activity in the United States, it helps to make the American home market bigger and better for the American farmer.

Secretary of Agriculture Henry A. Wallace stated to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives on January 12:

> I do not know of a single case in which such duty reductions have seriously inconvenienced any American agricultural industry. As a matter of fact, in cases where a damaging influx of agricultural products might take place as a result of duty reductions, meticulous care has been taken to see that safeguards were introduced to prevent such an influx.

The Secretary of Agriculture cited as an example the imports of beef cattle under concessions granted by the United States in the trade agreement with Canada. This concession has been frequently and untruthfully described as a threat to the American cattle industry.

The facts are that the concession applies to only two classes of beef cattle, those weighing 700 pounds or more each, and those weighing 200 pounds or less each. Furthermore, the tariff reduction under the agreement is limited by quotas. Not more than 225,000 head of beef cattle weighing over 700 pounds each—slightly over 1 percent of the average annual slaughter of cattle and calves in the United States—can be admitted to this country under reduced duty in any one calendar year, and not more than 60,000 in any one 3-month period. The reduced duty on calves applies to not more than 100,000 head per year. On beef cattle weighing more than 200 but less than 700 pounds each there has been no reduction of the 1930 tariff rate of 3 cents a pound. And this class of cattle made up 54 percent of all the beef cattle imported into the United States in 1939.

Imports of beef cattle into the United States in 1939 were 328,388 head greater than imports in 1938, but nearly half of the total increase was in cattle of a class on which the duty had not been reduced; and, in addition, 22,674 head of cattle falling in the classes on which duties have been reduced, paid the full 1930 tariff because of the tariff-quota restrictions in the Canadian agreement.

Kansas cattlemen, and producers of other things as well, who have been told that their industries would be threatened by huge influxes of imported meat products as a result of tariff reductions through trade agreements, should recall that very recently negotiations for agreements with Argentina and with Uruguay were terminated because the negotiators for this country were unwilling to grant the provisions which might have made possible such an influx. They insisted upon qualifications, quotas, and restrictions for the protection of American meat producers. Both those proposed agreements were of extreme importance from the viewpoint of international politics in the present crisis. But the United States Government refused to "sell American cattlemen and farmers down the river" in order to put them into effect.

The real clinching evidence on whether the concessions on cattle in the Canadian trade agreement have damaged the interests of American cattle producers is the fact that the average farm price received by American farmers for beef cattle in 1939 averaged $6.87 a hundred pounds against $6.28 in 1938. The farm price of beef cattle in the United States has been above parity every month in 1939, and in part because the trade-agreements program has stimulated industrial activity in the United States and enabled American workmen to buy more beef.

There have been equally misleading statements about increased imports of wheat into the United States in 1939 as compared with 1938. The fact is that no United States tariff on wheat fit for human consumption has been lowered under any trade agreement. The only wheat tariff that has been lowered is that on wheat unfit for human consumption, wheat that American farmers import to feed to their livestock. Imports of wheat into the United States for milling in bond and reexport—making jobs for Americans in mills and on railroads—increased in 1939 over 1938 by some 6,000,000 bushels, and made up almost the entire importation in both 1938 and 1939. No flour from that wheat entered the United States market.

Wheat imported into the United States for human consumption here—about 215,000 bushels in 1939—all pays the full 1930 tariff rate of 42 cents a bushel. These imports in 1939 amounted to about three one-hundredths of 1 percent of the United States wheat production and about three-tenths of 1 percent of United States wheat exports in the same year. Efforts to make these figures show a flood of competitive imported wheat would be ridiculous even if the imports had received any duty reduction, which they have not.

Kansas farmers, like those of other States, are keenly aware of the disparity between the prices they receive for the things they sell, and the prices they must pay for the things they buy on a tariff-protected market. The trade-agreements program is one of the most effective of the measures which this Government is taking to correct that disparity. Through the trade agreements, this country has reduced its tariffs on scores of articles that farmers buy, offsetting at least in part the monopolistic advantage which the tariff has long given to industry in the United States.

According to a recent estimate by the Department of Agriculture, based upon 1935 statistics, tariff duties on products the farmer consumes, if fully effective in raising prices on those articles, would have cost American farmers in that year $681,000,000, or $108 for each farm family.

In 1933 the ratio of prices received by farmers in the United States to the prices they paid, was 64 to 100 against the farmer. In 1939 this ratio was only 77 to 100. In 1933 farm cash income in Kansas was $152,000,000 and in 1939 it was $241,000,000, a gain of 58 percent. Kansas farmers contrast these trends upward in income and prices with the steep downward trends in the 4 years 1930–33 under the Hawley-Smoot tariff policy.

Under the trade-agreements program, the United States has reduced tariffs on more industrial imports than agricultural imports, contrary to a frequent misstatement. On the other hand, the trade agreements have yielded to the United States concessions on a greater proportion of our agricultural than of our industrial exports. The statistics stand for themselves as an answer to the charge that under this program the American farmer has been "sold down the river for the benefit of the manufacturer."

It is true that world economic conditions have changed—and for the worse—since the adoption of the trade-agreements program in 1934, a program in which 21 of the principal trading nations of the world have joined with the United States. There is war in Europe and war in the Orient. Nations, for their own defense, are adopting rigorous controls over their internal economies and their foreign commerce—measures widely at variance with the principles of the trade-agreements program. But these facts offer no reason for abandoning now the program which is, in fact, the only available mechanism for meeting realistically the wartime conditions of international trade.

The policy and the framework of procedure laid down by Congress in the Trade Agreements Act of 1934 are broad enough to enable the President and his advisers from the Tariff Commission and the other Government departments to make the necessary technical changes and adjustments in our commercial relations with foreign countries, and to make them speedily, scientifically, and efficiently. If wartime trade must be carried on under restrictions and difficulties, the Trade Agreements Act and the trade-agreements organization are equal to the job. To abandon them now would leave the United States with no flexible and effective mechanism for protecting the interests of American agriculture and American industry either during the perilous time of war or in the post-war period of reconstruction.

In all ways, the Trade Agreements Act and the trade-agreements program conform to the requirements of a resolution adopted by the Kansas State Board of Agriculture at its sixty-ninth annual meeting, January 10–12, 1940. That resolution reads:

TARIFFS AND TREATIES

Reciprocal-trade treaties, when negotiated, should have the unanimous support and approval of the Secretary of State, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce. They should be primarily for the purpose of restoring the export outlets for surplus commodities. We insist that this principle be adhered to in framing future trade treaties and that there be no reduction, either by legislative enactment or through treaties, in present agricultural tariffs on any farm product that would have the effect of holding or reducing domestic price levels below a proper balance with industrial prices.

The Trade Agreement Act, by its own terms, requires the approval of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, and Commerce, for every agreement before the agreement is concluded. Congress, in passing the act, wrote into it as its purpose the enlargement of foreign markets for American products. The figures I have already given provide statiscal proof that under this program the domestic price levels of farm goods have been helped to rise toward the proper balance with industrial prices, and have not been held down or reduced.

In the past 5 years the reciprocal trade-agreements program has proved its benefits in peacetime to industry and agriculture in Kansas and in the United States as a whole. Now, with wars raging in foreign countries, it is needed more urgently than ever to protect our interests and maintain our living standards. When the wars shall have ended, regardless of who are the victors or what alinements of nations shall emerge, the principles of the trade-agreements program offer a sound and tested foundation upon which the United States can take the leadership in setting up a new and better world economy. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, 14 Democrats and 7 Republicans listened to the speech made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DINGELL], who spoke very feelingly of the industrialists who are manufacturing motor vehicles in Michigan. He also called attention to the men and women who are working in the factories producing motor vehicles.

He forgot to tell you that the average wage for those working in the motor industry, including those who are sweeping floors and doing like tasks, is 90 cents per hour and that the average daily wage in the Ford factory for 8 hours' work is $7.25; that, in contrast with that, the wages of the farmers, those who grow the food that keeps the factory worker alive, are less than $1 per day for from an 8- to a 10-hour day.

Some day, and I hope it will be soon, the farmer is going to demand, and insist upon receiving, a fair return for his labor. No one begrudges the city worker a living wage. On the other hand those who live in the cities and who enjoy many advantages, which it is physically impossible for the farmer and his family to have, should show a little sympathy, a little willingness—while they are upholding unions which want an ever-increasing wage and an ever-lessening hour—to aid the farmer in securing parity payments for the things he grows and sells.

EVENTUALLY, WHY NOT NOW?

The House might well adopt that well-known slogan. Eventually, if the A. F. of L. is not to be swallowed alive, independent unions and the freedom of the independent worker destroyed, and American labor turned over to the mercies of the C. I. O. revenue collectors, the National Labor Relations Act must be amended.

For 2 years or more the demand for the drastic amendment of this act has been steadily growing until today there is no longer any doubt but that the American people are insisting upon a change.

The House Labor Committee for more than a year successfully prevented any amendments coming to the floor of the House. The House, in unprecedented action, appointed a special committee to, among other things, determine whether the National Labor Relations Board had been fair and impartial in its interpretation and administration of the law; whether the act needed amendment, and, if it did, what amendments were deemed advisable. That action on the part of the House was taken—and this proposition admits of no successful contradiction—because the House deemed its regular labor committee either incompetent or indolent.

The House Labor Committee took this rebuke sitting, if not lying, down. It has been going through the motions now and then of hearing witnesses. But it seems, from surface indications, no nearer to reporting out a bill than it was 2 years ago.

In the meantime, the House special committee, doing an excellent job, has demonstrated from the files of the Board itself that it has, in part at least, the answers to questions 1, 3, and 4 contained in the resolution creating it.

Its hearings have shown, in answer to question 1, that the Board has not been fair and impartial.

Whatever may be said of the intelligence and the abstract legal learning of the reviewing attorneys appointed by the Board, it must be conceded that not a few have no judicial or industrial experience which would qualify them to pass upon the questions which are submitted.

As an illustration, permit me to cite the appointment, as a reviewing attorney at a salary of $2,700 a year, of Ann Landy Wolf, a Hungarian woman, 27 years of age, who came to the United States in 1929, was naturalized in 1935; who has a husband drawing a salary of $4,600 a year in another Government department; who was appointed by the Board to review thousands of pages of testimony and then to state orally to the Board her conclusions, based upon her examination of that testimony. She is but one of several of like type.

Young men, possessing no greater qualifications than did she and in some instances perhaps not as great ability as she, have performed like functions.

The Board has employed trial examiners, one of whom, Pratt, made the statement to the effect that, when a hearing began, the employer "had two strikes on him." Another examiner, Seagle, called the statement of an attorney presenting a client's issue, a "lie" and referred to his argument as "idiotic discussions."

Another attorney, Solomon G. Lippman, 27 years of age, found to be incompetent for the work assigned to him, was transferred to another position with the Board and had his salary increased.

The hearings before the Smith committee have shown that the trial examiners and reviewing attorneys traveled outside the record, obtained and considered evidence which the party charged with an unfair labor practice had no opportunity to meet.

The Board, notwithstanding the fact that the N. L. R. A. itself provides that—section 4, subdivision (a)—

Nothing in this act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor—

Employed David G. Saposs, a Russian, whose writings clearly show that he is saturated with communistic doctrines, to make independent investigations and to report to investigators, trial and reviewing attorneys, and to the Board his,

Saposs', interpretation of testimony about to be given or testimony introduced in the hearings.

Now, get that proposition. Think of the viciousness, the downright wickedness, of the practice here in America of employing the methods of the Russia from which Saposs came. Can you conceive of anything more unfair, more destructive of confidence in administrative or judicial procedure, than the employing of an agent to go out and make an ex parte investigation and then report to an administrative officer or board his conclusions as to what certain testimony meant?

Such a procedure deprives the man accused of an unfair labor practice of his day in court. It deprives him of his right to be confronted with the witnesses against him. It deprives him of the right of cross-examination. It deprives him of an opportunity to meet and refute the charge which has been made against him. It deprives him of a fair, open trial.

Our Supreme Court on two occasions—in the Scottsboro case and in the case decided within the past week—has set aside the conviction of a number of Negroes on the sole ground that they did not have a fair and an impartial trial, this although there was much evidence to show that these men were guilty of a most revolting criminal offense.

Is the American employer to be denied a lesser opportunity—in fact, all opportunity—to meet his accusers face to face?

The hearings before the Smith committee have disclosed from the files of the Board itself that Lee Pressman, general counsel of the C. I. O., on the 2d day of June 1937 went to Pittsburgh, after consultation with the secretary of the Board, and instigated a strike; and that the Board thereafter aided in prolonging the strike by instituting charges against the Inland Steel Co. because it refused to perform an act not required by the National Labor Relations Act; an act which the Supreme Court had said it need not perform; an act which the purported author of the act had declared it could not be required to do.

The investigations show that the Board has, by its conduct, aided in the organizing campaigns of one labor organization.

The hearings before the Smith committee disclose that Chairman Madden has employed the methods of the blackmailer, of the extortionist, in his effort to coerce companies into the making of collective-bargaining contracts. This has been demonstrated by his own letters, which show that he asked another agency of the Government, the R. F. C., to withhold loans, not only from those who had been found guilty of unfair labor practices but from those who were about to be charged or were charged with the violation of the National Labor Relations Act. Such conduct is indefensible and no one who was not utterly obsessed with the idea that he was above the law would undertake such a course.

Enough has been said to show the utter unfairness of the present Board to fairly perform its duties. In passing, it might be added that the Chairman of the Board has, on more than one occasion, seen fit to use his official position and Federal funds appropriated for the administration of the act in an effort to create discord between members of the A. F. of L. and officials of that organization, with reference to the amendment of the act—this in violation of a Federal statute.

It is one thing for members of a Government department to appear before committees of Congress, having charge of legislation affecting their department, and express their views fairly and accurately. It is an entirely different thing for members of a Federal department to, unsolicited, use public funds in an effort to secretly induce third persons to lobby for measures the passage of which, directly or indirectly, inure to the benefit of that particular department. The function of department officials is to administer the laws enacted by Congress and give Congress the benefit of their experience.

There is no longer, on the record made by the Smith committee, on the record made in the public press, any doubt but that the Board is biased, partisan, and wholly unfitted for the interpretation and administration of the act.

The Evening Star of last Saturday carried what purported to be a statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH], chairman of the House investigating committee, that he hoped whatever amendments the committee might endorse would be reported to the House Labor Committee within 2 weeks, and that he stressed the need for quick action if any change is to be made in the National Labor Relations Act at the present session.

It is encouraging to know that the chairman of the special committee has reached that conclusion. For more than a year I have been suggesting to the House that, if it really wanted the N. L. R. A. amended, there was no reason why it should not do so.

About a year ago I suggested to the House that, so far as legislation was concerned, the House Labor Committee appeared to be trying to incubate a setting of china eggs or doorknobs. The same procedure apparently continues.

A further comment in the newspaper article referred to was to the effect that outstanding amendments now being considered by the special committee included: First, abolition of the present three-man Labor Board and its replacement by a new five-man Board. That provision can be incorporated in H. R. 4990, introduced by me in March of 1939.

Another provision being considered by the Smith committee is: Second, complete separation of the prosecuting and judicial functions of the Board. If you have the time and the patience to read it, you will find that H. R. 4990 contains a provision accomplishing that very thing.

Provision 3, now being considered by the committee, is as follows:

(3) Removal of the Board's authority to settle disputes among rival unions, such as the feuds between the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, which have caused so much bitterness in the last few years.

H. R. 4990 does not contain that provision, but I have an amendment to that effect drafted, and as soon as Lee Pressman, general counsel for the C. I. O., commits himself, if he can be induced to commit himself either for or against such a provision when he testifies this week before the House Labor Committee, I will offer a bill containing that amendment.

H. R. 4990 contains many other amendments which, if we ever get a fair and just labor law, will be included in such an act.

It is a strange spectacle to see a House of Representatives, with a membership of over 400, acknowledge, as it does acknowledge, that the National Labor Relations Act should be amended and to watch that House, so paralyzed by what?—you answer—that it either cannot or will not bring out on the floor of the House a bill introduced to amend an act which we know should be amended, and there in open debate show its competency to perform the task entrusted to it by the people by writing a just and equitable labor law.

If you want action, walk up to the Clerk's desk and sign petition No. 23. Bring out the bill I introduced; then throw it in the wastebasket, if you wish, but write something in answer to the demand which our constituents have been making upon us. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. MCCORMACK having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 407, had come to no resolution thereon.

The matter referred to follows:

TARIFF PROTEST BY ECONOMISTS AND TEACHERS OF ECONOMICS

The undersigned American economists and teachers of economics strongly urge that any measure which provides for a general upward revision of tariff rates be denied passage by Congress, or if passed be vetoed by the President.

We are convinced that increased protective duties would be a mistake. They would operate, in general, to increase the prices which domestic consumers would have to pay. By raising prices they would encourage concerns with higher costs to undertake production, thus compelling the consumer to subsidize waste and inefficiency in industry. At the same time they would force him to pay higher rates of profit to established firms which enjoyed lower production costs. A higher level of protection, such as is contemplated by both the House and Senate bills, would therefore raise the cost of living and injure the great majority of our citizens.

Few people could hope to gain from such a change. Miners, construction, transportation and public-utility workers, professional people, and those employed in banks, hotels, newspaper offices, in the wholesale and retail trades, and scores of other occupations would clearly lose, since they produce no products which could be protected by tariff barriers.

The vast majority of farmers, also, would lose. Their cotton, corn, lard, and wheat are export crops and are sold in the world market. They have no important competition in the home market. They cannot benefit, therefore, from any tariff which is imposed upon the basic commodities which they produce. They would lose through the increased duties on manufactured goods, however, and in a double fashion. First, as consumers they would have to pay still higher prices for the products, made of textiles, chemicals, iron, and steel, which they buy. Second, as producers, their ability to sell their products would be further restricted by the barriers placed in the way of foreigners who wished to sell manufactured goods to us.

Our export trade, in general, would suffer. Countries cannot permanently buy from us unless they are permitted to sell to us, and the more we restrict the importation of goods from them by means of ever higher tariffs the more we reduce the possibility of our exporting to them. This applies to such exporting industries as copper, automobiles, agricultural machinery, typewriters, and the like as fully as much as it does to farming. The difficulties of these industries are likely to be increased still further if we pass a higher tariff. There are already many evidences that such action would inevitably provoke other countries to pay us back in kind by levying retaliatory duties against our goods. There are few more ironical spectacles than that of the American Government, as it seeks, on the one hand, to promote exports through the activity of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, while, on the other hand, by increasing tariffs it makes exportation ever more difficult. President Hoover has well said, in his message to Congress on April 16, 1929, "It is obviously unwise protection which sacrifices a greater amount of employment in exports to gain a less amount of employment from imports."

We do not believe that American manufacturers, in general, need higher tariffs. The report of the President's committee on recent economic changes has shown that industrial efficiency has increased, that costs have fallen, that profits have grown with amazing rapidity since the end of the war. Already our factories supply our people with over 96 percent of the manufactured goods which they consume, and our producers look to foreign markets to absorb the increasing output of their machines. Further barriers to trade will serve them not well, but ill.

Many of our citizens have invested their money in foreign enterprises. The Department of Commerce has estimated that such investments, entirely aside from the war debts, amounted to between $12,555,000,000 and $14,555,000,000 on January 1, 1929. These investors, too, would suffer if protective duties were to be increased, since such action would make it still more difficult for their foreign creditors to pay them the interest due them.

America is now facing the problem of unemployment. Her labor can find work only if her factories can sell their products. Higher tariffs would not promote such sales. We cannot increase employment by restricting trade. American industry, in the present crisis, might well be spared the burden of adjusting itself to new schedules of protective duties.

Finally we would urge our Government to consider the bitterness which a policy of higher tariffs would inevitably inject into our international relations. The United States was ably represented at the World Economic Conference which was held under the auspices of the League of Nations in 1927. This conference adopted a resolution announcing that "the time has come to put an end to the increase in tariffs and to move in the opposite direction." The higher duties proposed in our pending legislation violate the spirit of this agreement and plainly invite other nations to compete with us in raising further barriers to trade. A tariff war does not furnish good soil for the growth of world peace.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, the passing of the late Honorable Cyrenus Cole, one of Iowa's distinguished citizens, came as a distinct shock to me and, I know also, to those Members of the body who were privileged to know him. For 12 years, 1921 to 1933, Congressman Cole ably represented the interests of his constituency in the former Fifth Congressional District of Iowa and rendered marked service to his State in the National House of Representatives.

Retiring voluntarily from public office at the end of his sixth term in Congress, he devoted the remaining years of a busy and useful life to the compilation of a history of Iowa which is acknowledged to be a worthy contribution to the literature of the State and to serve as a fitting monument for a splendid citizen and public servant.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and cause His face to shine upon us. Heavenly Father, with our souls enrobed with this prayer, and with a chastening sense of our failures and needs, we pray for Thy guiding grace and wisdom. May Thy presence with us be like the sun that radiates light, like the stars that shed calmness, like the morning that sings freshness, and like the evening that whispers quietness. This day let us be at rest in the Father's love and in the gracious protection of His Son, Jesus Christ, the friend of man and the Saviour of the world. Do Thou ever enfold us in the blessed security of the everlasting arms. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TREASURY-POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 8068) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, disagree to all Senate amendments, agree to the conference requested by the Senate, and the appointment of conferees on the part of the House.

I may say that I have consulted the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], the ranking member on the Republican side of the aisle, and I understand this procedure is agreeable to him.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. LUDLOW, O'NEAL, JOHNSON of West Virginia, MAHON, CASEY of Massachusetts, TABER, MCLEOD, and KEEFE.

BOARD OF VISITORS, UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations:

EXPORT OF PETROLEUM PRODUCTS TO RUSSIA

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter here from the Department of State, which I think is rather interesting and which I want to read to the House:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 19, 1940.

The Honorable FRANK E. HOOK,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HOOK: I acknowledge the receipt of your letter of February 10, 1940, in regard to the export of petroleum products from the United States to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

According to available records there were no exports of oil to the country in question during 1939 other than a nominal amount of lubricating oils valued at $94. There were no exports of aviation gasoline to the U. S. S. R. during 1939 or during January 1940, with the exception of two barrels for experimental purposes. Exports of regular gasoline during 1939 amounted to 883,530 barrels, all of which went to Siberia and were exported during the months of September, October, and November. Heavy shipments of gasoline to Siberia during the autumn are not unusual. There were no exports of gasoline to the Soviet Union during December 1939, although approximately 75,000 barrels were exported to eastern Siberia during January 1940.

There is no existing legislation which authorizes the prohibition of the export of petroleum products to the U. S. S. R., or to any other country. Before such exports could be prohibited, new legislation would be required. Furthermore, the mere severance of diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union would not prevent the sale and export of petroleum products to that country.

I may point out, however, that the Department has taken steps to discourage the further delivery of plans, plants, manufacturing rights, or technical information required for the production of high-quality aviation gasoline to countries the armed forces of which are engaged in the unprovoked bombing or machine-gunning of civilian populations from the air. This policy was announced by the Department in a statement issued to the press on December 20, 1939, a copy of which is enclosed.

I am enclosing, for your further information, a copy of the press release issued by the Department on December 15, 1939.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the letter I have read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech I delivered at Philadelphia Saturday night.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein two short excerpts from Collier's magazine.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend the remarks which I expect to make during the day on the reciprocal trade-agreements resolution and to include therein certain quotations, excerpts, and data relative thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, in connection with the remarks I expect to make on the pending bill, that I may be permitted to insert certain tables illustrative thereof, and to revise and extend them.

THE HOME OWNERS' LOAN CORPORATION

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, I have here in my hand a copy of H. R. 8447, which I introduced, to give relief to the distressed home owners who are now holding H. O. L. C. mortgages. This bill, if enacted into law, will grant to home owners the right to extend the period for amortization of their loans to 25 years and will reduce the rate of interest on such loans to 4 percent.

I wish to state at this time that I believe the Home Owners' Loan Corporation has done a fine job insofar as saving hundreds of thousands of homes throughout the country. There is no doubt in my mind that the H. O. L. C. Act was one of the finest pieces of legislation passed during the Seventy-third Congress. The Home Owners' Loan Corporation has done everything possible under the act to be lenient to the home owners. I feel that we should amend the law to give the Corporation power to be more lenient, and by doing so we will save thousands of homes that are threatened with foreclosures. That is the object of my bill H. R. 8447, which I would like to see approved by Congress.

I would appreciate it if Members of the House will try and get the House Banking and Currency Committee to report favorably my bill or any other bill which is in the committee that will bring relief to the distressed property owners in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and to include therein at this point in the RECORD a copy of my bill, H. R. 8447.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any obligation of a home owner to the Home Owners' Loan Corporation incurred pursuant to section 4 (d) of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933, and outstanding at the time of the enactment of this act—

(1) Shall, upon application of the home owner made to the Corporation within 1 year after the date of the enactment of this act, be revised and extended so as to provide for the amortization thereof by means of monthly payments sufficient to retire the interest and principal within a period, to be determined at the option of the home owner, of not to exceed 25 years from the date of its execution; and

(2) Shall be revised so as to provide, effective as to payments falling due on dates occurring after 30 days after the date of the enactment of this act, and thereafter, that interest on the unpaid balance of the obligation of the home owner to the Corporation shall be at the rate of 4 percent per annum.

SEC. 2. (a) The provisions of this act shall not be construed to provide for any modification of the provisions of the Home Owners' Loan Act of 1933 insofar as they apply to loans made, or obligations incurred, under any provision of such act other than section 4 (d), or for the revision or extension of any loan made, or obligation incurred, under such provisions other than section 4 (d).

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the Bonneville project, and to include therein a brief tabulation of figures.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH]?

There was no objection.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], who is still confined to his home on account of illness, may have permission to insert the remarks at this point in the RECORD that he intended to make yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER]?

There was no objection.

PRESENT TRADE-TREATY PROGRAM SHOULD NOT BE EXTENDED

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the issue which is before us is of such vital concern to the Nation that it should not be considered as a partisan matter. Of course, I realize that the tariff issue is one which has long divided the two great political parties, but during recent years they have grown closer and closer together on the question. Many Democratic members are just as stanch protectionists as some of their Republican colleagues. Some of the best tariff speeches I have ever read were written by Democrats, not only of the present era but going far back to the early days of our history as a Nation.

OPPOSITION TO PRESENT PROGRAM BIPARTSIAN

The immediate question before us is whether the present trade-treaty program should be continued for another 3-year period. On this question, as on the tariff question generally, many Democrats take the same position which we of the Republican minority take. Opposition to the present trade-treaty program is by no means confined to the Republican side of the isle. I make mention of this particularly because of a reference on page 5 of the majority report to the fact that support of the program is not confined to the Democratic Party, but includes certain Republicans, whose names are there mentioned.

I am glad to join in the thought that this should be a nonpartisan matter, but I cannot help but call attention to this list of so-called Republican supporters of the program. Two of those named are international bankers. Most of the rest of them think almost exclusively along international lines. That is the only comment I care to make or need to make, for when you find an internationalist you find a free trader. There is no question about that.

REPUBLICANS NOT OPPOSED TO GENUINE RECIPROCITY

At the outset of these remarks, and before going into any discussion of the present trade-treaty program, I want to emphasize as strongly as I can the fact that we of the Republican minority are not opposed to tariff reciprocity as such. It has generally been assumed that because we oppose the form of the present act and the manner of its administration by the State Department, we must necessarily be opposed to all reciprocity with foreign nations. That is not so, and in our minority views we have taken the trouble to explain exactly our position on this matter.

Apparently there are at least two kinds of reciprocity—real reciprocity and the so-called reciprocity advocated by Secretary Hull. The fact that we favor real reciprocity does not commit us to support the present trade-treaty program, which is inconsistent with the true purpose of real reciprocity. Moreover, it is not even reciprocal, in that the concessions which we make to a given treaty country in return for supposed concessions from it are extended gratuitously to all other countries in the world, except Germany. The word "reciprocity" presupposes equal and mutually advantageous exchange, but that is not what we have under the present program. As was brought out during the hearings, no

Yankee trader would swap horses with his neighbor and then proceed to give a horse to everyone else in the community.

THE REAL PURPOSE OF RECIPROCITY

The real purpose of reciprocity was never more clearly stated than by its outstanding exponent, President William McKinley, who said:

The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend rather to increase their employment.

PRESENT PROGRAM INCONSISTENT WITH PURPOSE OF RECIPROCITY

The present program is inconsistent with the real purpose of reciprocity because it is not confined to exchanging our surpluses for the products we need but do not produce ourselves. Rather, it has been devoted largely to encouraging the importations of foreign products of farm, factory, mine, and forest, which we already produce for ourselves in great abundance.

The only purpose we carry on foreign trade at all is to sell what we can and to buy what we need. To be of any net benefit to the country, a reciprocity program must be consistent with the purpose of foreign trade, and if it is consistent with that purpose it will be consistent with the purpose of reciprocity itself.

NO PRESENT REASON FOR EXTENDING ACT

Before going into any detailed discussion of our objections to the trade-treaty program, I wish to bring up a matter which I feel transcends in importance any differences which may exist as to the proper kind of reciprocity for this Nation to have.

When the Trade Treaty Act was first enacted in 1934 it was for the avowed purpose of expanding our export markets, and I propose to show later wherein it has not done so.

When the question of its extension came up in 1937 the principal argument then was that it was desirable as a means of preserving world peace, and I propose to show wherein it has failed to achieve this purpose, as must be obvious to anyone.

Now its extension is being sought not so much for the expansion of our export markets, and not as a means of "preserving" peace, but as a means of dealing with "the problems of economic reconstruction when hostilities have ceased."

In his statement before the Ways and Means Committee the Secretary of State admitted that "the scope for going forward with the program during the war is naturally restricted." There can be no question about this. It is apparent also that inasmuch as treaties have already been entered into with practically all the industrial nations with whom it is possible to secure agreements, the only field for further negotiations is with agricultural countries, such as Argentina, New Zealand, Australia, Denmark, and so forth, whose products would simply add to our own agricultural surpluses and further depress farm prices. Thus there does not appear to be any present reason for extending the act.

PRESENT ACT NOT ADAPTED FOR DEALING WITH POST-WAR READJUSTMENTS

The question then is, Should the act be extended as a means of dealing with a situation which will exist when the wars now going on in all parts of the world have ceased and the tens of millions of men now under arms return to productive labor?

In the opinion of the Republican minority of the Ways and Means Committee, the Trade Treaty Act in its present form would neither be efficacious nor desirable in dealing with the chaotic conditions that undoubtedly will exist when peace comes. Because of the thousand-odd tariff reductions made to date, we do not have much left to bargain with. Moreover, any further reductions in our tariffs in the face of post-war economic conditions would dangerously expose our domestic market to the ravages of post-war foreign competition.

WE WILL NEED HIGHER, NOT LOWER, TARIFFS WHEN PEACE COMES

If history is any guide, what we will need when peace comes is not lower tariffs, but more adequate tariffs. Gentlemen on the other side of the aisle may say I am only manufacturing fear, but we had a somewhat analogous situation during and after the late war to what we have now. It is worth referring to.

OUR POST-WAR EXPERIENCE UNDER THE FREE-TRADE TARIFF OF 1913

It will be recalled that in 1913 a Democratic free-trade tariff act was passed, known as the Underwood Act. That act put practically all agricultural commodities on the free list and drastically reduced the rates on other dutiable articles. However, before the consequences of that act could be fully felt war broke out in Europe and eventually spread throughout the world. The result, insofar as our foreign trade was concerned, was that, despite being under a free-trade tariff, we had virtually no competition from European countries. They were otherwise occupied.

ARMISTICE BROUGHT DELUGE OF CHEAP IMPORTS

However, when the armistice came in 1918 and the millions of men who had been under arms returned to productive employment, our domestic producers felt the full impact of the tariff reductions made under the 1913 act. The first thing that happened was that we were flooded with surplus food, clothing, and other articles which had been sent abroad as war supplies. These were dumped into our market at prices which were simply ruinous to American agriculture, industry, and labor. But the imports of surplus war supplies did not end the flood. As soon as the men who had been under arms got back to their jobs and to their farms they began seeking markets for their products, and they found here in our country not only the richest market in the world but one in which they had no difficulty in entering because of the absence or inadequacy of our tariff duties on competitive products. These cheap foreign importations contributed largely to the collapse of farm prices, to the stagnation of our industry, and to unemployment following the World War.

EMERGENCY TARIFF ENACTED IN 1921

In 1920, a Republican Congress hurriedly enacted an emergency tariff bill to stem the flow of these foreign imports. Unfortunately, that measure was vetoed by President Wilson. However, immediately after the Harding administration came into power in 1921, it was promptly reenacted and became a law. It was superseded in 1922 by the general tariff bill of that year, the so-called Fordney-McCumber Act.

PRESENT SITUATION ANALOGOUS TO WORLD-WAR CONDITIONS

Now, what is the analogy which is to be drawn between the situation then and the situation in which we now find ourselves? It is this: Under the 22 trade treaties entered into to date, our tariffs have been drastically reduced on over 1,000 products. These reductions affect 42 percent of our dutiable imports, which, of course, make up those which compete with our own products. The average reduction in rates has been 39 percent. Thus, we have had a more drastic and more general tariff reduction by piecemeal under the trade treaties than any President would dare suggest or any Congress would dare enact in a general tariff bill.

It is said by proponents of the program that despite the large number and drastic nature of these reductions, our domestic producers have not been injured—at least not much. As to this, I will have something to say later on in these remarks.

TREATY PROGRAM HAS PAVED WAY FOR POST-WAR FLOODING OF DOMESTIC MARKET

Approximately one-half the reductions made were under the British treaty, which became effective on January 1, 1939. However, the fact that all during 1939 the leading nations of the world were either engaged in war or in preparation for war saved us from the full effect which otherwise would have been felt as a consequence of the drastic reductions made. We are now in the same situation we were during the Great War. We have a boom in exports, as a consequence of the war, and we have a sharp diminution of competition from abroad. Nevertheless, imports of competitive commodities are still very substantial.

Under the 22 trade treaties negotiated to date, we have already paved the way for another post-war flooding of the domestic market with surplus food and clothing, which have been accumulated abroad as war supplies, and with the products of foreign farms and factories, as normal foreign production is resumed.

WITNESSES BEFORE COMMITTEE WARNED OF DANGERS TO WHICH TREATY PROGRAM EXPOSES US

Numerous witnesses who appeared before the committee stressed the point that continuation of the policy of entering into further trade treaties at this time and binding ourselves for long periods was dangerous. I would like to refer to two or three quotations from statements made before the committee relative to this phase of the situation. I refer to these quotations because they express so much better than I am able the situation which will confront us when wars in all parts of the world come to an end.

TWENTY-FIVE MILLION FOREIGN SOLDIERS WILL RETURN TO PRODUCTIVE EMPLOYMENT

The following is taken from the testimony of Mr. Millard C. Brown, president of the Continental Mills, of Philadelphia, Pa.:

Today, as a result of our reciprocal-trade program, many of our protective duties are lower than in the act of 1922. Again Europe and Asia are at war. It is estimated that twenty to twenty-five million men and women are in the service of the warring countries, either on the battlefield or other services connected with the war. When we again have peace on earth and Europe and Asia have exhausted themselves; when they have added greatly to their already burdensome debts; when their currencies are greatly depreciated; when their returning armies are willing or are conscripted to work for a mere pittance to keep from starvation, the influx of imported farm and industrial products will be a more serious threat to our economy than ever before in our history. It is time that we were putting our house in order to withstand the shock. * * * Unless we start soon in putting our house in order the beautiful day dream of reciprocity will turn into the most hideous nightmare the country has ever been through. * * *

When peace is declared it will be too late to make the necessary adjustments.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES WILL USE DESPERATE MEASURES TO REGAIN FOREIGN TRADE

The following is taken from the testimony of Mr. Arthur Besse, president of the National Association of Wool Manufacturers. After referring to the large increase in woolen imports as a result of the British treaty which, though somewhat curtailed since the war began, are nevertheless substantial, Mr. Besse states:

The situation after the war will be ever more serious. Poorly paid labor, desperate measures at price control and manipulation of foreign exchange, export bounties, and other measures which foreign nations will use to rebuild their trade will find us vulnerable, with gaps in the tariff wall which Congress erected to protect our home industries. How can we trade with foreign nations for tariff concessions then? We have already made substantial concessions, which have been extended to all nations except Germany. Are we to be told that we must make further concessions to get our export trade back again, and accept further tariff cuts, on the theory that our willingness to admit foreign products will contribute to world peace? * * *

It is precisely because, after the war, we will need adequate protection more than ever that our tariff should not be entrusted to a statesman who thoroughly believes in and has consistently striven for a lowered tariff. It is my opinion that our problem is not going to be how to find indirect means of reducing tariff rates, but how to provide adequate protection for our workers against low paid and perhaps even conscript workers in Europe and Asia.

NO PRUDENT PERSON WOULD BIND HANDS IN FACE OF FUTURE UNCERTAINTIES

The following is from the testimony of Mr. Howard I. Young, representing the National Association of Manufacturers:

Let us for the moment assume the many advantages asserted by proponents of the future extension of the present Trade Agreements Act. Let us then confront the great practicalities. I know of no man in public life for whom my associates entertain a more profound admiration and respect than the present Secretary of State. But can he or any member of this committee, or the most sagacious of statesmen, undertake to say what will be the condition of any nation engaged in the present struggle, or that may become involved in it, at the end of this awful conflict? Will any member of this committee undertake to do so?

Within a few brief months a virile state with which we concluded one of the first trade agreements, and others with which we were about to negotiate, have met political death. What states will endure? What will be the number and nature of their dependencies? What will be the extent of their territories, their economic strength or weakness, the condition of their currencies, the state of exchange, the tendency of prices, the development of quotas, the conditions of trade, investment, indebtedness, of taxes? Who will venture to say? The event is in the hands of God. I know no representative businessman, no American industry, that would undertake to bind itself today for the marketing of its products in any of the warring nations for a 2- or 3-year term. No man upon his own responsibility or as trustee of others would make such commitments to an uncertain future.

Who would write an insurance policy for a house on fire or within a city afflicted with a catastrophe conflagration or against the consequences of a flood or an earthquake in being?

Yet what is proposed now is that, without the safeguards suggested, we shall continue to make the most binding international contracts amid "crash of matter and the wreck of worlds."

These, ladies and gentlemen of the House, are challenging statements.

MINORITY FAVOR SETTING UP ADEQUATE MACHINERY TO DEAL WITH POST-WAR SITUATION

We of the Republican minority are not insensible to the fact that the setting up of some desirable machinery for dealing with the foreign-trade situation when peace is restored is desirable. In our minority views we point out that the present trade-treaty program, far from lending flexibility to our tariff structure, actually is the essense of inflexibility. In fact, we assert that it places the Nation in an economic strait jacket.

Let me briefly quote from our views respecting our recommendation for a substitute program. On page 9 of our report, we state:

PRESENT PROGRAM SHOULD BE ALLOWED TO LAPSE, BUT STUDY SHOULD BE MADE TO DETERMINE BEST METHOD OF DEALING WITH RECIPROCITY AND TARIFF QUESTIONS

Without prejudice to our views in favor of tariff reciprocity as a matter of principle, we recommend that the joint resolution under consideration be defeated and that the present trade-treaty program be allowed to lapse.

However, we feel that the question of post-war readjustments and the preservation of the normal channels of commerce are of vital importance, and that we as a nation should consider setting up a truly flexible trade authority which would be able to deal with these problems as and when they arise. The present Trade Treaty Act does not provide a satisfactory method of dealing with all the possible problems with which we may have to cope. For example, it is not adapted to meeting any requirement for increased tariff protection that may, and probably will, arise in the future. Moreover, with its administration in the hands of the State Department, economic considerations are frequently ignored in favor of international political objectives.

We believe that the Congress should immediately authorize an investigation of the whole question with a view to working out a combined tariff and tariff and reciprocity policy (1) that protects our vital interests, (2) that is truly flexible, and (3) that is geared to deal with foreign trade upon a realistic basis along constitutional lines. Consideration should be given to the creation of some independent agency to deal with both matters.

This is a constructive suggestion. It negatives any thought that we of the minority are merely for doing away with the present program without any substitute therefor. It definitely commits us to a policy of real reciprocity along constitutional lines as distinguished from the present one-sided and unconstitutional program. We do not presume to suggest the exact details of such a substitute program because we believe they should be worked out after careful study without reference to any preconceived notions.

IF TREATY PROGRAM IS CONTINUED, CONGRESS SHOULD AT LEAST RESERVE RIGHT OF APPROVAL

Knowing that the administration will make every effort to enact the pending joint resolution without change, and having in mind that its "appeasement program" in connection with the sudden termination of the Argentine negotiations may be expected to have some results along the lines hoped for, we have also offered an alternative suggestion, which I would now like to discuss. In our minority views we state:

If despite its many objectionable features and in disregard of the dangers to which it is exposing the Nation the present Trade Treaty Act is extended, we feel that it should be amended at least to the extent of requiring congressional approval of the trade treaties before they become effective.

Aside from the constitutional question involved we believe that inasmuch as these treaties vitally concern the welfare of the whole Nation the elected representatives of the people in Congress should have some say in regard to them.

This is not to be construed as a retreat from our position that the present act should be allowed to lapse. We simply state that if the administration insists on going ahead with the program, Congress at least should have some check on the treaty negotiators, not only to protect the Nation from actual or potentially injurious tariff reductions, but to give the Congress an opportunity to say whether its hands shall be tied insofar as legislating in the future with regard to items affected by the trade treaties is concerned.

HANDS OF CONGRESS TIED BY TRADE TREATIES

The Secretary of State has always insisted that the matter of general tariff legislation is still in the hands of Congress, but I do not agree with that contention. In the first place, the thousand-odd reductions made under the trade treaties and their extension to all countries constitute a general tariff revision not made by Congress, not approved by Congress, and with respect to which Congress is powerless to act. Secondly, Congress can take no action with respect to the items covered by trade agreements without violating an international agreement and thereby breaking faith. Its hands are tied for the life of the treaties, which is at least 3 years, and as long thereafter as the administration in power wishes to continue them. The treaties do not expire at the end of 3 years. They are simply subject to termination upon notice, and presumably that notice could not be given by Congress as that would involve an invasion of the rights of the Executive. Even if the Congress felt impelled to repudiate the treaties by enacting legislation to supersede them as a matter of national emergency, such legislation would be subject to the almost certain Presidential veto, and it would therefore require a two-thirds majority in both branches to enact it. Hence to say that Congress is free to act is certainly a misstatement of facts.

CONGRESSIONAL RATIFICATION OF TREATIES IS ONLY WAY MEMBERS CAN REGISTER THEIR DISAPPROVAL

Aside from constitutional considerations, which I hope to have time to discuss later, there are many reasons why congressional approval of trade treaties should be reserved. It is the only way by which Members of the House and the Senate can register effective opposition to any harmful reductions. Members on both sides of the aisle have had experience in going before the Committee for Reciprocity Information to protest against reductions contemplated under specific treaties. They know from bitter experience how futile it is to appear before that body, which does not even have any part in the actual negotiations of the treaties. They know from what happens when the treaties are finally entered into that their protests are generally ignored.

I sympathize with those Members on the other side of the aisle who have gone before the Committee on Reciprocity Information in behalf of their constituents, particularly when they have voted at least once, and perhaps twice, in favor of the act or its extension. They, of course, realize they surrendered their constitutional authority over tariff making to the executive branch and that they had to get down on their knees in order to try to save their people from unwise and injurious tariff reductions.

CONGRESS NOW HAS TO PLEAD WITH BUREAUCRATS NOT TO MAKE INJURIOUS RATE REDUCTIONS

It seemed rather strange to me when I appeared before the committee in connection with the British agreement to have to go before that body to plead for my constituents. The Constitution gives Congress the power to write tariff rates, and our constituents send us here to legislate as their Representatives. We have gone a long way from representative government when Congressmen have to go before bureaucrats to plead with them not to change rates of duty that the Congress itself has fixed.

I should think that those Members on the other side of the aisle who have gone before the Reciprocity Committee would want to take advantage of the opportunity they now have to regain at least some control over tariff making by requiring trade treaties to be submitted to Congress for approval.

MEMBERS CAN PROTECT THEMSELVES BY VOTING FOR CONGRESSIONAL APPROVAL OF TREATIES

I recall that when the Argentine and Chilean treaties were under consideration, certain Members on the other side of the aisle and in the other body let it be known that if certain rates were reduced they could be counted on to vote against the extension of the trade-treaty program. They will feel rather awkward if they should vote for the continuation of the program and find later that negotiations with Argentina and Chile were resumed and reductions previously contemplated were made. They can protect themselves by voting for House and Senate approval of future treaties. If they fail to do so and subsequently the rate reductions to which they have registered their opposition are made, they may find it hard explaining to their constituents why they did not seize the opportunity, which is being afforded at this time, to give Congress a hand in the treaty negotiations.

MOST FOREIGN LEGISLATIVE BODIES RESERVE RIGHT TO APPROVE TREATIES

The argument was made 6 years ago that the Executive needed a free hand in negotiating treaties so he could deal on an equal footing with the heads of other governments, it being asserted they had the power to enter into treaties without the requirement of legislative ratification. Of course, that was no argument for doing away with congressional approval, because we do not have the same system of government as other nations have. We have a constitutional government under which the powers of government are divided among the legislative, executive, and judicial branches. But, aside from that fact, it appears that the argument then made was actually without foundation. Of the 22 treaties which have been negotiated thus far only 3 have been put into effect without legislative ratification, namely, those with Belgium, Cuba, and Ecuador; and of the remaining treaties 10 were subject to ratification by the foreign legislative bodies before they became effective, and 9 went into effect provisionally subject to subsequent ratification.

DIFFICULTY OF SECURING CONGRESSIONAL APPROVAL OF TREATIES NO ARGUMENT AGAINST IT

Reference has been made to the difficulty in the past of securing congressional approval of trade treaties, but if a particular treaty is unable to command a majority vote in both Houses, the chances are that it is not in the best interest of the country and should not be entered into. Certainly the combined judgment of the Congress, representing every section and every congressional district in the country, is entitled to more weight than the views of any one man, regardless of who he may be. This is a representative government—not a one-man government.

DELAY IN SECURING APPROVAL COULD BE AVOIDED

It is also said that congressional ratification of treaties would result in delay, but certainly Congress could be expected to consider individual treaties as rapidly as they have been considered in some of the foreign countries, where legislative approval has been required. Congress could have taken 11 months to approve the Brazilian treaty without delaying matters, because that is how long the Brazilian Legislature took. Two of the treaties required 8 months for approval by the foreign legislative bodies, another 6½ months, and another 5½ months.

We of the minority are perfectly willing to support a provision in connection with congressional ratification of the treaties which would provide for their expeditious consideration and prevent their being stifled in committee or filibustered to death in either branch.

In connection with the amendment which we offered in committee providing for congressional approval of the treaties, we added the provision giving privileged status to general resolutions providing for approval of treaties, as in the case of the reorganization plan submitted by the President under the Reorganization Act. Neither that amendment nor any other we offered were approved, inasmuch as the Democratic majority had prepared the way for reporting out the joint resolution without change.

CONGRESSIONAL RATIFICATION WOULD PROVIDE OPPORTUNITY FOR PUBLIC HEARINGS ON COMPLETED TREATY

Another desirable feature of congressional approval of the treaties would be that it would provide an opportunity for public hearings on the completed treaties. At present no such hearings are conducted. The hearings which take place before the Committee for Reciprocity Information are held prior to the negotiation of the treaties, when their terms are, of course, not known. Congressional approval of treaties is the only way in which American agriculture, industry, and labor can be sure that careful consideration will be given to their interests and the interests of the Nation at large. It is high time that the Congress resumed its constitutional functions and put a stop to the unwholesome and un-American trend toward the centralization of all authority in the executive branch.

OBJECTIONS TO PRESENT TREATY PROGRAM

I turn now to our objections to the form of the present act and the manner of its administration by the State Department. I propose to show first that the trade treaties have been injurious to domestic producers; second, that they have not resulted in expanding our export markets, particularly for farm products; third, that they have not contributed to peace; and, fourth, that the act in its present form is unconstitutional.

ANALYSIS OF REDUCTIONS MADE UNDER TREATIES

In discussing the injury which the trade-treaty program has resulted in, it may be advisable first to analyze the 22 trade treaties which have been negotiated to date. Under those treaties there have been 1,012 reductions in rates, which affect 42 percent or nearly one-half of our dutiable imports. These reductions have averaged 39 percent.

In view of the fact that our concessions are extended not only to imports from the individual treaty countries but to the entire world with the sole exception of Germany, there can be no question but what they have resulted in bringing about a general downward tariff revision. In other words, the treaty program has been used for other purposes than just "Yankee trading."

Let us further analyze the rate reductions which have been made thus far. In the minority report on the pending joint resolution there will be found a table, prepared by the Tariff Commission, showing both the number of reductions and the percentage of reduction by tariff schedules. It will be seen from this table that 662 of the 1,012 rates affected were reduced by more than 30 percent, and that 415 of the total were reduced by more than 40 percent.

As we are informed, the effect of the reductions in approximately 80 percent of the instances has been to bring the rates even below the rates on the same products under the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, which, even by critics of the 1930 Tariff Act, was conceded to be a reasonable tariff. When we go below the rates of the 1922 act we are, of course, approaching the level of the free-trade Underwood Act of unhappy memory.

IMPORTS OF ARTICLES SUBJECT TO REDUCED RATES INCREASE FASTEST

It has been contended by opponents of the trade-treaty program that domestic producers have not been adversely affected by the reductions made thus far. This does not square with the testimony of American agriculture, industry, and labor before the Ways and Means Committee in the course of the recent hearings on the pending joint resolution.

Between 1934 and 1938 imports of commodities on which the duty had been reduced under trade treaties increased by 46 percent, compared with only a 14-percent increase in the case of dutiable imports not affected by trade treaties.

Of course, the whole purpose in making tariff reductions is to enable foreign countries to have easier access to our market and to sell their goods in competition with our own. To say that American producers are not injured by the importation of competitive foreign goods is to deny what is incontrovertibly a fact.

FOREIGN IMPORTS OF COMPETITIVE PRODUCTS DISPLACE OUR OWN

We have a consumptive capacity in this country for only so much, and, if our needs are supplied by foreign producers, they obviously cannot be supplied by domestic producers. The importation of a yard of woolen cloth from England displaces a yard of cloth which might have been produced in American woolen mills by American workmen. It gives employment to English labor and takes away employment from American labor.

In this connection, I am reminded of the statement which Abraham Lincoln made about the tariff, which is apropos at this time, in view of the fact that we recently celebrated his birthday. He put the tariff question in very simple language, saying in effect that if we bought some rails from a foreign country, we had the rails, the foreign country had our money, and a foreign workman was given employment. Conversely, when we bought American rails, we still had the rails, but we also had the money, and an American workman rather than a foreign workman was given a job.

NO NEED FOR IMPORTING GOODS WE ALREADY PRODUCE

It has been contended by trade-treaty proponents if we expect to sell our own goods abroad, we must permit foreign countries to trade with us. Conceding this point simply for the sake of argument, it does not follow that we must buy foreign products which we do not need. There are plenty of things we do need and do not produce, which we must buy from abroad, to give foreign countries the wherewithal to purchase our own goods, particularly when there is added to that foreign purchasing power the tremendous amount of competitive goods they sell us despite our present tariff duties, and there is added also the purchasing power which we have given them as a result of the staggering purchases of foreign gold and silver at inflated prices, and the additional money left abroad by our tourists and sent by immigrants to their native lands.

RATES REDUCED ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS OF WHICH WE HAVE SURPLUS

Let me refer briefly to the importation of agricultural products. The Secretary of Agriculture, of course, concedes that a surplus of a given commodity depresses prices. That is why we have the Agricultural Adjustment Act to limit production. That is why we have the Surplus Commodities Corporation to buy up farm surpluses. Yet it seems rather inconsistent for any department of the Government to be pursuing a policy which encourages even greater surpluses of these very commodities by drastically reducing our tariffs. In the fiscal year 1939 over $30,000,000 was spent on surplus-removal operations of 20 different commodities the tariff on which had been reduced under trade treaties.

The Secretary of Agriculture knows full well that surpluses of foreign products prevent our farmers from obtaining parity prices, yet the trade-treaty program has encouraged the importation of foreign farm products the domestic prices of which are far below parity. This is another inconsistency between the farm program and the trade-treaty program.

It is not my purpose to discuss in detail the effects of the trade-treaty program as applied to agriculture, as I am sure this matter will be fully gone into by Members from those States which are primarily concerned with farming. However, I do want to call attention to the testimony before the Ways and Means Committee of the heads of the two great farm organizations—the National Grange and the American Farm Bureau Federation.

NATIONAL GRANGE OPPOSES EXTENSION OF TREATY PROGRAM

The National Grange was represented at the hearings by its master, L. J. Taber, who made an able presentation of the viewpoint of his organization, which represents a total membership of approximately 800,000 farmers in 36 States. Mr. Taber called attention to the inconsistency between the administration farm program and the trade-treaty program, and discussed the Trade Treaty Act in all its aspects. I commend his remarks to Members, particularly from the farm States. In my opinion, he made one of the most convincing statements in opposition to the present program that the committee heard during the entire hearings.

At this point I would like to quote the resolution respecting trade treaties adopted by the National Grange at its recent annual meeting held at Peoria, Ill. It is as follows:

The reciprocal trade agreements program has caused serious damage to American agriculture. It has depressed farm prices by encouraging imports of competitive products from countries where substandard labor conditions prevail. It is wrong in principle and violates the Constitution. It should not be renewed when it expires by its own limitations on June 12, 1940.

Thus we have one of the great farm organizations of the country taking the definite position that the present Trade Treaty Act should not be extended.

FARM BUREAU FEDERATION QUALIFIES ITS SUPPORT OF PROGRAM

The American Farm Bureau Federation was represented by its president, Mr. Edward A. O'Neill, of Alabama.

I would like to call particular attention to the resolution adopted by the Farm Bureau with respect to trade treaties, because it has generally been asserted that the Farm Bureau is favorable to the treaty program. However, in my opinion, the reservations which it makes practically places it in the same position as the Grange. I quote from its resolution:

In giving our support to the continuance of reciprocal-trade agreements we renew, with increased emphasis, our demand that no agreement be consummated the effect of which might be to force or hold domestic prices for any farm commodity below parity level. Any other course would justify the condemnation of and opposition to such agreement by all agricultural groups.

We further insist that in the negotiation of trade agreements economic factors be given consideration equivalent to the weight accorded to the factors of diplomacy and statecraft. To this end we urge that the Reciprocal Trade Act be amended to provide that no agreement be consummated unless unanimously approved by the Secretaries of State, Commerce, and Agriculture.

I call particular attention to the first paragraph of the resolution I have just read, wherein it is stated in effect that any trade treaty the effect of which might be to force or hold farm prices or any commodity below parity level, should be condemned. In my opinion, that amounts to an indictment of every trade treaty thus far entered into affecting farm products.

AGRICULTURE SHOULD NOT BE FOOLED BY TERMINATION OF ARGENTINE NEGOTIATIONS

While I am discussing the trade treaties as they affect agriculture, I would like to refer briefly to the negotiations with Argentina and Uruguay which were only recently terminated. Both of the major farm organizations opposed the negotiation of these treaties. I have already touched on the fact that a great many Members of Congress, including many Members on the other side of the aisle, appeared before the Committee for Reciprocity Information protesting against any reduction in the duty on South American farm products. Some Members, not only of the House, but of the other branch, went so far as to state that if the Argentine treaty was concluded, and reductions were made on farm products affecting their sections, they would be forced to oppose the continuation of the program.

The strange thing was that just prior to the time the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee introduced the resolution to extend the treaty program, announcment was made that the negotiations with Argentina had been "terminated." The explanation given by the State Department was that there had been a failure to come to any understanding as to the concessions which this country would make. I should not be surprised, however, if the breaking off of negotiations with Argentina did not have some connection with the fact that the treaty program was soon coming up for extension.

I wonder how many Members are going to be led to support the extension resolution on the supposition that there will be no trade treaty with Argentina? During the hearings there was considerable bandying of words over what was meant by the word "terminated," as used in the Secretary of State's announcement regarding the breaking down of the Argentina negotiations. The question was raised whether there should not be added the qualifying word "temporarily" terminated. But even though we accept the Secretary's statement that the negotiations were ended with no further meetings scheduled, there is nothing in the world to prevent the negotiations from being reopened at any time, even though the whole procedure, involving giving notice of intention to negotiate, and so forth, has to be gone through with. Of course, I do not suppose that there is any likelihood of negotiations being resumed while House Joint Resolution 470 is still pending in Congress.

LABOR GROUPS ALSO OPPOSED TO TRADE-TREATY PROGRAM

Opposition of organized labor to the extension of the treaty program was also brought out during the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee. Mr. Matthew Woll, vice president of the American Federation of Labor and president of the American Wage Earners' Protective Conference, waited around for several days to testify, but, because of the lengthy calendar, was not reached before he had to leave to attend the sessions of the American Federation of Labor at Miami, Fla. However, he presented a very comprehensive brief to the committee, which is found in the printed hearings, and I suggest that it be read by all Members.

Speaking for the organization of which he is the head, Mr. Woll opposed the continuation of the trade-treaty program, unless the treaties were made subject to ratification by the Senate. He asserted that without resorting to misrepresentation and distortion of facts the proponents of the present trade-treaty program could not show where the treaties as a whole had been helpful in providing employment for American workers. He stated that the admission into the American market of products of foreign workers who were paid from 5 to 25 cents an hour would undermine and destroy the effectiveness of the Fair Labor Standards Act. He also stated that the trade treaties nullify the protection which is intended to be afforded American workers by the Asiatic Exclusion Act and the Immigration Act, meaning of course that while we continue to prevent the foreign worker from coming here and competing in our labor market, trade treaties bring about the same result by admitting the products of his labor.

To offset Mr. Woll's testimony and that of other representatives of labor who also appeared in opposition to the treaty program, the administration offered as a witness Mr. Isador Lubin, Commissioner of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor. Naturally he was favorable to the program, as it would hardly be expected that anyone not favorable thereto would be continued in office by the administration. He produced various charts and figures to convey the impression labor had benefited by the trade-treaty program. However, I for one would rather take the testimony of Mr. Woll and others, who are directly affected by the program, than Mr. Lubin, who speaks purely from a theoretical standpoint and who, of course, is able to conjure up figures to prove his point of view—at least to his own satisfaction.

ATTITUDE OF BUSINESS GROUPS

Business and industry also were represented at the hearings by numerous witnesses. The majority, of course, will refer to the large number of businessmen who are favorable to the program, but in practically every instance those who take such a position are in the export business and naturally have a selfish interest in the program. They, of course, do not realize the sacrifice others are made to bear in order to gain for them, or attempt to gain for them, lean foreign markets.

In an effort to make it appear that business generally was favorable to the program, the majority caused to be inserted in the hearings large sheaves of letters, carefully gleaned from the files of the Ways and Means Committee, favoring the program. An examination of these letters discloses, however, that they are practically all from firms engaged in the export business. The chairman did not state how many letters had been received by the committee in opposition to the program, and, of course, he did not include any such letters in the hearings.

One of the outstanding witnesses before the committee was Mr. Howard I. Young, president of the American Zinc, Lead & Smelting Co., of St. Louis, who represented the tariff committee of the National Association of Manufacturers. With him was associated Dr. John Lee Coulter, a former member of the United States Tariff Commission, who reviewed the effects of the program over the 5½ years of its operation, while Mr. Young himself confined his remarks to the general principles underlying the program.

I have already referred to the conclusion of the National Association of Manufacturers that any further negotiation of trade treaties at the present time was undesirable in view of present chaotic conditions and the unknown post-war situation.

Taking up the effects of the trade-treaty program to date, Dr. Coulter, as economist for the association, pointed out that the treaty program had brought about a general tariff reduction, involving not only a loss of revenue but an increase in imports which displace our own labor and increase unemployment and adversely affect the domestic price structure. He asserted that much of the damage done by the treaty program was obscured by reason of the fact that it had been carried on during a period of expanding industrial activities and rising prices. He contended that the damage would show itself more completely when the millions of men now under arms throughout the world return to productive labor and seek an outlet for their products.

Another very able and informative witness was Mr. Arthur Besse, representing the National Association of Wool Manufacturers. Mr. Besse spoke as a practical businessman who was in a position to give first-hand information as to the adverse effects of the trade treaties on the woolen-goods business. Mr. Besse, as I have previously stated, also questioned the wisdom of entering into further treaties at this time in view of conditions as they now are and particularly in view of conditions as they are likely to be when peace comes to Europe.

Referring to the impact of the treaty program upon his own line of business, Mr. Besse said:

> The result of these duty cuts was immediately apparent when the United Kingdom agreement became effective on January 1, 1939. During the first 5 months of the year shipments of woolen and worsted goods from Great Britain to the United States showed an increase of 385 percent as compared with a like period in 1938. * * * Naturally, since the outbreak of war with Germany, English mills have experienced some difficulty in forwarding woolens to this country. * * * Imports for 1939 will be the largest of any year since 1929. Our industry was saved from a flood of woolen imports this fall by the fact the English mills were otherwise occupied.

The National Association of Cotton Manufacturers, while not represented at the hearings by a witness, filed a brief with the committee, which is printed in the hearings. In their brief they point out that numerous reductions had been made on cotton goods under various treaties, and assert that inasmuch as the domestic production of cotton goods largely has to be consumed in the domestic market, any tariff reductions that take away any part of that market bring disaster and hardship not only to the industry but to the community wherein the local industry is located, and the workers as well.

In the report of the Democratic majority it is asserted that—

> A large number of witnesses representing the membership of both major political parties, and coming from all sections of the United States, testified in support of the resolution.

It is to be noted that the majority did not claim that "most" of the witnesses favored the continuation of the trade-treaty program as at present administered—only "a large number." Of course, the fact is that aside from administration witnesses the great preponderance of the testimony was unfavorable to the present program. In addition to those already mentioned as having testified in opposition, mention should be made of the outstanding statements made by Mr. Samuel Crowther; Mr. George N. Peek; Mr. F. E. Mollin, representing the American National Livestock Association; Mr. E. H. Cooley, representing the Massachusetts Fisheries Association; Mr. Joseph M. Wells, representing the United States Potters Association; Mr. Hugo N, Schloss and Mr. C. B. J. Molitor, representing the American Lace Manufacturers Association; Mr. Walter R. Peabody, representing the American Tariff League; Mr. Joseph Heath, representing American lace workers; Mr. James M. Duffy, representing American pottery workers; and Mr. Joseph E. Mayeur, representing American window-glass cutters. Other outstanding statements could also be referred to if time permitted. I should mention, also, the able statement made by Mr. Henry Fraser, dealing with the constitutional aspects of the program, to which I invite the attention of all Members.

TARIFF EXPERT ADMITS THAT DOMESTIC INTERESTS ARE INJURED BY TREATIES

It is, of course, impossible in the limited time available for me to discuss all the testimony presented at the hearings; but the fact is that we have the testimony of practical men, saying that the trade-treaty program has worked to the disadvantage of American agriculture, industry, and labor, to contrast with the statements of administration officials and impractical tariff "experts," who say that American producers have not been hurt by the program—at least, not much. I asked one of these experts whether all the changes that have been made in the trade treaties had been distinctly beneficial to our industries. His reply was:

> The answer would be "No"; not all of them have been. The reductions in duties which have been made have not been intended to be beneficial to American industry. They have been made to help our export trade with the least injury to American industry. And they have been made so as to do the least possible damage to American industry.

So here we have the statement of one of the so-called tariff experts that the reductions in duties are not intended to be beneficial to American industry, but to help those who engage in the export business at the expense of American industry in general. Thus what they are doing is to rob Peter to pay Paul, but they are doing it in such a way that the latter is not benefited to the same extent that the former is injured.

It must not be forgotten that 92 percent of our goods are consumed here at home and that only 8 percent are shipped abroad. We are injuring 92 percent of our business to help 8 percent. There is no necessity for injuring anyone. We can help our exporters without hurting domestic producers by following the policy to which I previously referred of trading our surpluses for the things we need but do not produce.

EXPORTS AND THE TRADE-TREATY PROGRAM

I turn now to the question of exports. What has the treaty program accomplished in the way of expanding our export markets, which, of course, was the stated purpose of the act?

Before discussing this point, let me briefly refer to events leading up to the original passage of the act.

Six years ago, the Congress was called upon to enact, under the guise of "emergency," this measure giving the President the authority to enter into binding trade treaties with foreign nations and to make reductions in our tariff rates pursuant thereto, without the specific approval of the Congress and without reference to any congressional rate-making standards. The act was originally limited to 3 years and was extended in 1937 for a second 3-year period.

SURRENDER OF TARIFF POWERS TO EXECUTIVE BASED ON ALLEGED EMERGENCY

What was the alleged emergency on which the surrender of the tariff- and treaty-making powers of Congress to the President were attempted to be justified? Reference was made to the sharp decline in our foreign trade from 1929 to 1932. This was the alleged emergency. It was said that the trade-treaty program which was proposed was "the only means" by which we could hope to regain our former large export markets.

This contention was made despite the fact that our foreign trade in 1934 had already increased considerably above the low point of 1932. In fact, I shall show later that the annual rate of increase in our exports from 1932 to 1934 was somewhat greater than it has been since the trade-treaty program has been in effect.

DECLINE IN FOREIGN TRADE FROM 1929–32 NOT RELATED TO TARIFF POLICY

It was contended by Secretary Hull and others that the decline in our foreign trade from 1929 to 1932 was largely the result of the passage of the Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act of 1930, and it was said that by reducing our tariffs we would be able to regain the large volume of foreign trade which we had enjoyed up to 1929. Of course, this argument was based on a fallacious premise to begin with. I do not propose to go into a discussion of what brought about the depression in this country, but it was world-wide in scope and resulted very largely as an aftermath of the World War. The depression, not only in this country but throughout the world, began at least 9 months before the Hawley-Smoot Act was passed. In fact, evidence was presented to the Ways and Means Committee that the decline in the world price level began some 5 years previous to that time.

Further proof that the Hawley-Smoot Act did not cause the depression is evidenced by the fact that from 1929 to 1932 imports on the free list declined in exactly the same percentage as imports on the dutiable list, indicating that the decline in foreign trade was the result of decreased purchasing power at home and abroad.

With this preliminary discussion let us see how the act has affected our export trade.

AGRICULTURAL EXPORTS HAVE DECLINED UNDER TRADE TREATIES

The farmers of the country were given the positive assurance in 1934 that they would be the chief beneficiaries of the trade-treaty program. But what do we find after 6 years of trade treaties? Official statistics of the Department of Agriculture, which are referred to in our minority views, show that in the fiscal year 1934 our agricultural exports were valued at $787,000,000. At that time, of course, the trade-treaty program had not come into operation. But the startling fact is that after the negotiation of these 22 trade treaties we find that our exports have declined from $787,000,000 in the fiscal year 1934 to only $683,000,000 in the fiscal year 1939, a loss of $104,000,000 in export trade under the treaty program.

Thus it appears that the trade-treaty program has failed to expand the foreign market for farm products. Not only has the value of farm exports declined sharply under the treaty program, but the farmers' share of our total exports has also declined—from 39.2 percent in the fiscal year 1934 to only 23.7 percent in the fiscal year 1939.

Recently numerous farm commodities have been subsidized on exportation. Any increases in the exports of these particular commodities must therefore be attributable largely, if not entirely, to the subsidy program and not to trade treaties.

WAR MATERIALS ACCOUNT FOR LARGE PART OF EXPORTS OF INDUSTRIAL ITEMS

So far as nonagricultural commodities are concerned, there have, of course, been increases in exports during the time the treaty program has been in effect; but are they attributable to the treaty program or to other factors? As we showed in our minority report, a large part of our recent export business has been in war materials and materials useful in war or preparation therefor. If it were not for these exports of war materials, failure of the trade-treaty program to increase exports would be even more apparent.

The strange thing is that while the trade-treaty program is supposedly dedicated to peace, its proponents are taking credit for all the increase in exports, most of which are attributable to war.

INCREASES IN EXPORTS TO NONTREATY COUNTRIES

Even as regards nonagricultural exports in general, it will be found that in many instances the principal increases were to nontreaty countries. Tables were inserted in the record of the hearings by at least two witnesses—Dr. John Lee Coulter and Walter R. Peabody—showing these to be the facts.

Of course, we are all familiar with the statistics of the State Department purporting to show that exports to treaty countries have increased to a greater extent than to nontreaty countries. Proponents of the treaty program rest their case very largely on this showing. Of course, it is difficult to tell just what the effect of the trade treaties has been, because of the fact, as I have already pointed out, that our export trade with all countries was on the increase prior to the time the treaty program came into effect. Presumably the increase would have continued even if the trade-treaty program had not been in effect.

In the statistics which the State Department and the Commerce Department have published, comparing trade with treaty and nontreaty countries, a break-down is always given of the trade with the treaty countries but no break-down is shown of the nontreaty group. They are all lumped together. They, of course, include a number of countries which during the past several years have been engaged in aggression or been the victims of aggression. It so happens all these countries were nontreaty countries. They include China, Japan, Manchukuo, Spain, Italy, Ethiopia, Albania, Germany, Austria, and Czechoslovakia. Naturally our trade with these countries has been interrupted during the time they have been involved in hostilities. If they are excluded from the nontreaty group of countries, then the picture is entirely different from that presented by the State Department.

EXCLUSION OF WARRING NATIONS SHOWS LARGEST GAIN IN EXPORTS TO NONTREATY COUNTRIES

On page 18 of the minority views there appears a table prepared by the Tariff Commission, showing the trade between the treaty and nontreaty countries, with those countries I have mentioned excluded. The table compares the year 1934, which is the last year prior to the trade-treaty program, with the last full year for which statistics are available—1938. It shows a greater increase to nontreaty countries—excluding the nations engaged in hostilities—than to treaty countries during the period 1934–38—60.8 percent as against 58.1 percent.

Tables have also been prepared by the Tariff Commission in an attempt to refute this particular table, which was prepared by them at the instance of the minority. They have selected different years and different bases so as to show a picture more favorable to the administration's point of view. Of course, we all realize that we can always pick a set of figures to show anything we desire, but the years 1934 to 1938 show the actual comparison before and after trade treaties.

There was also inserted during the hearing a break-down of our trade with nontreaty countries by countries. This table appears in the hearing at page 917. I call attention to this table as showing the large increase in our trade with nontreaty countries, which far exceeds the increase in the case of many treaty countries. For example, comparing 1934–35 with 1937–38, exports to Venezuela increased 160 percent; to Argentina, 96 percent; to Chile, 80 percent; to the Irish Free State, 171 percent; to Norway, 81 percent; to Russia, 183 percent; to Rumania, 100 percent; to Turkey—at that time a nontreaty country—292 percent; to British Malaya—also a nontreaty country at that time—102 percent; to New Zealand, 66 percent; Union of South Africa, 61 percent, and so on.

INCREASED EXPORTS, NOT NUMBER OF CONCESSIONS, IS WHAT COUNTS

There has been inserted in the hearings by the majority a series of tables, covering over 250 pages of the record, purporting to show concessions obtained for the United States in foreign markets. Of course, the whole purpose of these lengthy tables is to make it appear we have received great benefits. However, it is not the number of concessions we receive but the nature of them and the extent to which they actually result in increased exports with which we are mostly concerned. It is to be noted even if all the concessions granted to us resulted in increased exports, which, of course, is a violent assumption, they still would only affect 14 percent of our total export trade.

The mere fact that a country grants us a so-called concession is no assurance whatever that it will be of any value to us in gaining export markets. Our ability to sell abroad depends upon whether we are able to undersell our foreign competitors. If they get the same or greater benefits than we receive, there is no net advantage to us as a result of the treaty concessions.

TRADE TREATIES AND PEACE

Turning briefly to the peace aspects of the program, I believe it is apparent to everyone who will look the facts squarely in the face that the trade-treaty program has not in the slightest degree achieved its unstated, but officially declared, secondary purpose of promoting world peace. Large groups in this country who are sincerely desirous of promoting peace—as, of course, we all are—have been led to support the program because they had been told or because they conscientiously believe it contributes to peace. However, the fact is that it has not done so. No tangible evidence can be presented of any contribution the trade-treaty program has made to peace. When it was first enacted conditions throughout the world were fairly normal. Since it has been in effect, however, conditions have grown progressively worse. We have had a series of aggressions against smaller countries, which are still going on, and England and France are again at war with Germany.

In no single instance was a recent war or aggression begun on account of trade restrictions. Japan did not march into Manchukuo and China because of tariffs levied against her goods by those countries; Italy did not take Ethiopia and Albania because of tariff restrictions against her; Germany did not seize Austria and Czechoslovakia because of trade restrictions; Germany and Russia did not invade Poland because of tariffs or trade restrictions; Russia is not fighting Finland over trade; England and France are not at war with Germany because of trade. In every instance these wars and aggressions were begun for reasons entirely apart from tariffs. Not only were they begun for different reasons, but the fact that China was one of Japan's best customers did not prevent the latter's invasion of that country. The fact that England and France were two of Germany's best customers did not prevent the war now going on between those countries. Germany, as a matter of fact, is one of the few countries with which France has a most-favored-nation treaty.

The peace aspect of the trade-treaty program was never suggested when the act was originally under consideration. It was a secondary thought after the program had failed to make any substantial headway in expanding our export markets. There is no question but what a large support of the program comes from people who have been mistakenly led to believe that trade treaties had some connection with peace. However, it must be apparent to them by now that if the trade-treaty program has any justification at all, it must be for other reasons than having contributed to world peace.

CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECTS OF TRADE-TREATY PROGRAM

To refer briefly to the constitutional aspects of the trade-treaty program, I simply want to point out that the present act involves an unconstitutional delegation of the tariff and treaty-making powers of Congress to the Executive. Congress, under the Constitution, has exclusive legislative powers. It can only delegate to the Executive administrative functions. Thus, under the flexible tariff it lays down a rate-making formula which it directs the President to carry out in connection with the Tariff Commission, which operates as a fact-finding body. Under the Trade Treaty Act, however, Congress lays down no rate-making formula. The Executive has complete discretionary power both as to the selection of the articles which are to be included in trade-treaty negotiations and as to the basis or criterion, if any is to be used, by which rate reductions shall be measured. The only limitation in the act is that no reduction shall be made in excess of 50 percent, but this is not a rate-making formula, but only a circumscribing of his discretionary authority. The absence of this rate-making formula in the Trade Treaty Act is the real distinction between it and the flexible-tariff provisions.

Of course it is said that legislative standards are laid down in the act, but I challenge anyone to find therein any rate-making formula or any standards which conform to the requirement laid down in the Supreme Court's decision in the flexible-tariff case. The Trade Treaty Act says that whenever the President shall find that either American or foreign tariffs "unduly burden" either our export or import trade, then he shall have authority to enter into trade treaties with foreign countries generally and make such reductions as are necessary or proper to carry out these treaties.

In the first place the question as to what kind of a tariff rate unduly burdens foreign trade is more a matter of opinion than a matter of fact. But, even if it be conceded that determination of such a matter is a question of fact, this finding is not a limitation on the items which may be reduced under trade treaties. It merely is a condition precedent to the President exercising his authority; first, to enter into trade treaties, and second, to reduce tariff rates pursuant thereto. There is nothing in the act limiting the treaties to duties which are burdensome or limiting the reductions in rates to a point which is not burdensome.

As a matter of fact, the authority delegated is so broad that the President can enter into treaties with any number of countries, and make any reductions he chooses, merely by coming to the conclusion that a single tariff rate, either of the United States or of any foreign country, "burdens" our export or import trade. That, as Mr. Justice Cardozo said of the N. R. A. Act, is "delegation running riot."

It has been said by proponents of the program that the present Trade Treaty Act is no more a delegation of authority than under previous reciprocity acts. This statement either shows their ignorance of previous reciprocity laws or it is a deliberate attempt to mislead. The fact is that under all prior reciprocity measures, Congress has either reserved the right on the part of both Houses to approve trade treaties when negotiated, or, if it has not reserved such right, it has specified in the Reciprocity Act not only the articles, but the precise reductions in rates, which the President could use as a basis for negotiation with foreign countries. There is absolutely no truth in saying that the form of the present Trade Treaty Act is comparable to past reciprocity measures.

VIEWS OF SECRETARY HULL AND CHAIRMAN DOUGHTON ON TARIFF MAKING BY THE EXECUTIVE

In connection with this reference to the constitutional aspects of the trade-treaty program, I would just like to refer briefly to the attitude of one or two leading proponents of the trade-treaty program with regard to the question of tariff making by the Executive. It seems that for one reason or another they have completely reversed their stand of a few years ago I believe they have attempted to justify their reversal of attitude on the ground there is some great emergency which justifies setting aside constitutional limitations and giving one man not only the right to reduce tariff duties and with them the revenue of the Government, but to exercise the power of life and death over every domestic industry, which is dependent for its existence upon reasonable tariff protection. A few years ago, when the flexible-tariff provisions of the 1930 Tariff Act were under consideration, the present Secretary of State, then a Senator, stated that this was—

> Too much power for a bad man to have, or for a good man to want.

But that is not all he said. He said that tariff making by the Executive is—

> Undoubtedly unconstitutional and is violative of the functions of the American Congress.

My good friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON] said of tariff making by the Executive when the flexible tariff was under consideration in 1930:

> It is subversive of our system, idea, and ideals of government—

And is—> a violation of the fundamental principles upon which it rests.

I could go on and quote from the chairman at great length, but I will simply refer to another brief statement which he made at that time. He said:

> It is too much power and authority to lodge in any man whoever has been, is now, or ever will be, President of the United States.

If these gentlemen were opposed to giving the President administrative powers under the flexible tariff, they should be even more opposed today to giving the President legislative and treaty-making powers under the Trade Treaty Act.

RIGHT TO QUESTION CONSTITUTIONALITY OF ACT PURPOSELY DENIED

The question may be asked here, Why, if the act is unconstitutional, has it not been tested in the courts? The answer is perfectly simple—it is that those who drafted the act did not want it tested in the courts and took particular pains to prevent any such eventuality. They inserted in the act an apparently innocuous provision, making inapplicable to items affected by the trade treaties the provisions of section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930. Reference to that section discloses the fact that it is the provision which gives American producers the right to appeal or protest the rate of duty being assessed by the collector of customs. In the absence of that provision, they would have no such right. Those in charge of the trade-treaty program realized that if this right were taken away from American producers, the chances of the act's constitutionality being tested in the courts would be virtually nil.

The excuse given for denying this right was that it would result in delay, but that argument no longer obtains by reason of an amendment to section 516 (b) made in 1938 under the Customs Administrative Act, providing that liquidation of entries shall no longer be suspended pending termination of litigation arising out of that section.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS OF REPUBLICAN MINORITY

In this discussion of the trade-treaty program, I have not attempted to cover all the various points which could be raised. I could stand here for hours talking on this subject and not duplicate a single argument. Others will doubtless discuss phases of the program upon which I have not touched. I do not feel it is fair for me to occupy too much of the time of the House, especially when debate is limited and other Members desire recognition. I shall bring my remarks to a close by simply quoting the conclusions and recommendations which we of the Republican minority set forth in our report. I quote:

Having carefully considered the trade-treaty program in all its aspects, we conclude—

CONCLUSIONS

1. That it has not been successful in accomplishing its primary purpose of expanding the foreign markets for the products of the United States or its unstated but officially declared secondary purpose of promoting world peace.
2. That it has not been administered in the national interest.
3. That it should not be extended in its present form, and as now being administered, particularly in the face of present and prospective world conditions.

We accordingly recommend:

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That the present act be allowed to lapse.
2. That a study be made with a view to setting up a substitute foreign-trade program (a) that protects our vital interests, (b) that is truly flexible, and (c) that is geared to deal with foreign trade upon a realistic basis along constitutional lines.
3. That if the present act is extended, it at least should be modified to provide for congressional approval of trade treaties before they become operative.
4. That the following additional amendments are also desirable:

(a) Before generalizing our treaty concessions to any country, require an affirmative finding by the Tariff Commission that the foreign country does not discriminate against American commerce or pursue acts or policies inconsistent with the purposes of the trade-treaty program.

(b) Set up a rate-making formula in the act by which trade-treaty negotiators would be bound in making concessions, such formula to be so worded as to prevent reductions in rates below an amount reasonably necessary to give American producers at least an equal opportunity with low-cost foreign producers in competing for the home market.

(c) Provide that no reductions be permitted on foreign farm products when the price of the competitive American product is below parity.

(d) Exclude from the scope of the trade-treaty program the import taxes imposed by section 601 (c) of the Revenue Act of 1932, as amended, and the processing taxes on certain foreign vegetable oils imposed by section 602½ of the Revenue Act of 1934.

(e) Restore to American producers the right to litigate matters arising out of the trade treaties, particularly the question of constitutionality.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution passed by the Michigan Muck Farmers' Association at a convention held in February.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a speech made in my congressional district by my colleague the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SHAFER]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an editorial from the Santa Monica Evening Outlook of February 16 under the caption "Protection From Irresponsible Agencies."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. LELAND M. FORD]?

There was no objection.

VIEWS OF FORMER PRESIDENT M'KINLEY ON RECIPROCAL-TRADE TREATIES

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECCOMBE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, in the course of this general debate on reciprocal-trade agreements, undoubtedly there will be many misinterpretations placed on the last public utterance of former President McKinley in regard to the extension of trade treaties. For fear that someone may try to accuse former President McKinley of being a free trader, and knowing that he was a great protectionist, and in favor of protecting the American market, the American workmen, and American farmers, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the Appendix of the RECORD and to include therein the last public utterance made by former President William McKinley on this subject at Buffalo, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECCOMBE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, may I make a statement with reference to former President William McKinley, for whom in memory we all have a very high regard. In speaking about protective tariffs, even though he firmly believed in them, he also made the very definite statement that American people—farmers, manufacturers, and all others—could not continue to sell where they do not buy. Everyone knows that money does not cross the ocean to balance trade between the countries of the earth, but, on the contrary, it is the surplus goods from one country in exchange for the surplus goods of another that accomplishes this. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, there is no reason for misunderstanding with reference to the statement of ex-President McKinley on reciprocal-trade agreements. It was nothing new. James G. Blaine, I think, was the first to talk of reciprocity. President Harrison did likewise. We all know that McKinley did favor reciprocal agreements between two nations, giving, taking, and making concessions between those two nations, with the approval of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, that is an entirely different situation from the Hull trade agreements, which have in them the unconditional most-favored-nation clause, which gives the same benefits and concessions of all nations of the world, bringing free American labor, paid $3 a day and upward, into direct competition with the poverty-stricken labor of the world, the 20-cent labor of Japan, the $1 labor of Italy, Germany, and Czechoslovakia. This is an entirely different situation, Mr. Speaker, and furthermore the trade agreements suggested by President McKinley were to be approved both by the House and the Senate. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, the gentleman from Mississippi made a statement the other day that he lost a suit of clothes. May I state that in 2 or 3 days I will present a statement of the Potomac Electric Power Co., showing that the gentleman should have lost his shirt because of the statement he made in regard to that company, a statement which is not warranted. The gentleman spoke of the great amount of earnings which he thought that company received from the public. I will show to the membership on the floor of the House that his statement is not sound—and I want the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] to be present—that they are only making an honest, legitimate earning, consistent with sound business and that they give the citizens of Washington, D. C., a square deal and good rates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

THE FARMERS AND THE TARIFF

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I will show where the Republican tariff has taken the shirts off all of us, especially off the American farmers.

I am glad the gentleman is investigating power rates because I have some figures on Pennsylvania to give him. However, I wanted to reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

If he will go back and study it, he will find that Alexander Hamilton was in favor of offsetting the tariff by an export debenture on farm products. In other words, never until the tariff logrolling of the last three-quarters of a century, which was started under the Republican Party, did they ever attempt to strip the farmers of what they made without giving them something in return.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD with reference to the late Gen. Frederick Funston.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a telegram from F. W. White, president of the Minnesota Farm Bureau Federation, together with a short article from the Modern Dairyman, regarding the reciprocal-trade agreements. I also ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein an article regarding automotive facts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection?

Mr. STEFAN and Mr. SNYDER asked and were given permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on the duty of a neutral, with appropriate international citations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a brief statement from Collier's magazine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 407, to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House Joint Resolution 407, with Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BOEHNE].

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Chairman, no other question of economic policy is as old, or has so frequently engaged the attention of the American public, as that of the relation of the National Government to foreign trade. The first legislation passed under the Constitution was the Tariff Act of 1789, and from that day to this, the tariff has been a live issue. Since the Civil War, and particularly in the last quarter of a century, there has been general dissatisfaction in America over the tariff situation. Even those persons who in principle have approved of protective tariffs have felt that the legislation was not as it should be. These thoughts have not been confined to the members of any one political party. One needs only to call to the attention of this Congress the number of letters and telegrams, as well as newspaper editorials that appear in the well-indexed hearings before the Ways and Means Committee in the consideration of this legislation. The political trading and logrolling which have undeniably been associated with the framing of tariff acts, and the notorious fact that large contributors to party campaign funds have been the recipients of special favors, have made even the friends of the tariff feel that "something ought to be done about it."

It is rather interesting to note what Alexander Hamilton, who is frequently credited with being the father of American protective tariffs, had to say in his famous Report on Manufactures. He said that—

> Protecting duties evidently amount to a virtual bounty on the domestic fabrics, since by enhancing the charges on foreign articles they enable the national manufacturers to undersell all their foreign competitors. * * * As often as a duty upon a foreign article makes an addition to its price, it causes an extra expense to the community for the benefit of the domestic manufacturer. A bounty does no more.

In the field of tariff, no more than anywhere else, can one get something for nothing. If some producers are encouraged by governmental subsidies, whether tariffs or direct bounties, others are discouraged. With direct bounties this discouragement comes from higher taxes and a restricted market for products on which no bounty is paid; with tariffs it comes from higher prices paid by the public and a restriction of the markets, both here and abroad, for those products which are produced more cheaply here than abroad, and which would ordinarily be exported.

You will hear much during these debates about tariff and the American standard of living. The argument that will be presented, in brief, runs about as follows: Low tariffs may be a sound policy for other countries, but the United States has a special need for very high tariffs on account of our high wage level. Unless high tariffs are imposed foreign goods will come in, throw Americans out of work, and ruin our standard of living.

This specter of a reduction of the American standard of living through a lowering of the tariff to the level of a sweated and peasant labor of Europe and Asia is held constantly before our citizens. There is no denying the fact that this is a very effective appeal.

High wages or a high standard of living means that the public receives for its work a large share of material things. High wages cannot be produced by the politician as the magician produces rabbits out of a hat. High wages can only result from a large amount of production per capita. It is the general standard of productivity that sets the wage level. If the American standard should be $5 a day for workers of given skill and training, that wage level is the result, in large part, of rich natural resources and our facilities for machine production. It is not based upon what Americans can do embroidering, making cutlery, or growing sugar beets or alligator pears.

Most of the confusion arises from a failure to distinguish between the prosperity of groups and the prosperity of the whole Nation. No one can deny that a high tariff enables some producers to make more money than they otherwise would, and in their particular industries to employ more men or pay higher wages than they otherwise would. The point is whether the whole Nation has a higher standard of living as a result of such measures. The payment of direct bounties to producers is undoubtedly a fine thing for producers and sometimes for their employees. Likewise the payment of veterans' relief to able-bodied men raised the standard of living of the beneficiaries, but few people believe that an indiscriminate granting of bounties or veterans' relief makes a country prosperous or raises its standard of living.

In spite of our high wage level we export more goods than any country in the world. All of these goods go to countries with standards of living lower than our own. We even sell to the Chinese and to the Japanese. Evidently these purchases by countries, which are occasionally called pauper-labor countries, of goods made in our high-wage country would not be possible unless the relation between productivity and wages were substantially as I stated them a moment ago. Whatever one may think of tariffs, there is no reason for having a special policy in the United States on account of our high standard of living. No matter what that standard of living may be, there will be some things which we will produce more cheaply than other countries and export abroad, and there will be other things which we can buy more cheaply abroad. This would be true if our standard of living were doubled; it would be true were our standard of living the lowest in the world.

It is not an easy thing to say that in recent decades the public has been somewhat unwilling to face a real tariff issue. Until some years after the Civil War the protective tariff had a definite purpose, namely, that of fostering industrialization. This original purpose of the tariff is no longer important. We have forgotten that the tariff is a bounty; that it takes from part of the public and turns the proceeds over to others. We prefer to believe that it consists in getting something for nothing, and at the same time it is defended as a means of benefiting everyone.

For some time now we have been hearing of a so-called scientific tariff, a tariff that was to equalize the cost of production abroad and cost of production at home. On the face of it, this seems to contain the solution. It appears reasonable and fair. When, however, we consider why international trade takes place, it is apparent that equalizing production costs does not get us out of a tariff impasse. The difference in production costs is what makes trade possible. If there were no difference, there would be no trade. The reason why America imports coffee, sugar, wool, fine cameras, and fine silks is that they can be produced more cheaply abroad. The reason we export wheat, cotton, automobiles, and many other articles is that we can produce them more cheaply than they can be produced abroad.

As a result of all this a new tariff procedure was brought into being in 1934 through the efforts of the Secretary of State, the Honorable Cordell Hull. There was passed by the Congress what is now known as the Trade Agreements Act of June 12, 1934, which for a period of 3 years gave to the President, through the Department of State, the power to negotiate reciprocal-trade agreements with other nations in an attempt to cause international trade to flow once more. That act had for its purpose the expanding of the foreign markets for the products of the United States.

The principle of authorizing the President to change tariff rates by Executive proclamation was not new in American tariff history, as the opposition would have you believe. The Dingley Act of 1897 had authorized the President to negotiate similar agreements covering a limited group of imports. Under this act, Presidents McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt negotiated agreements with France, Portugal, Germany, Italy, Switzerland, Spain, Bulgaria, the Netherlands, and Great Britain. The individual agreements, by the way, were never referred to Congress but went into effect by Presidential proclamation.

The Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922 authorized the President to increase or decrease duties on any particular article when, on the basis of an investigation by the Tariff Commission, he found that existing duties did not equal the difference between the costs of production in the United States and the principal competing country. This so-called scientific or flexible tariff was no answer to the larger problem of tariff policy, but certainly it furnished a precedent for tariff changes by Executive action.

The Trade Agreements Act expired by limitation in 1937, at which time it was renewed for another term of 3 years. Today we are debating as to whether or not this act should be given another lease on life. I believe that this is a very important battle, and I think that the prime consideration should be, Is the continuance of this type of tariff making for the general welfare of the whole Nation? Of course, every one of us as Representatives of our constituency feel it very keenly when something occurs here in Washington that vitally affects a portion of those people who have seen fit to send us here. On the other hand, it is necessary for us, as Representatives in Congress, to look at the entire panorama and be guided only by those considerations, which we believe will make for a healthy and prosperous nation.

No doubt others will speak about individual trade agreements that have been consummated by the Department of State. I prefer to touch on only one more item, and that is the relationship between this program and the livelihood of the American farmer.

It is true that the work of rebuilding international trade on a sound basis has been rendered quite difficult by the outbreak of a new major war. It is safe to say that the scope of operations of a new trade-agreements program will be restricted by war conditions, but that is no reason for abandoning the entire program. Those who take that position overlook the all-important fact that the chances for sound economic restoration after the war will be almost nonexistent if we now abandon our work in behalf of sound trade policies. The fact that during the past few years 21 nations showed their willingness, by entering into reciprocal-trade agreements with us, to modify their trade policies in a more liberal direction, offers a solid basis for the hope that, with peace regained, there will be a good opportunity for completing the work of trade restoration. That precious opportunity will be lost if we should now reverse our own policy and turn our face straight back toward suicidal economic nationalism with its Hawley-Smoot embargoes.

Much of the propaganda being poured out is that the trade-agreements program has caused an increase in our imports of agricultural products and that this has hurt agriculture. During 1939 we imported into this country $1,118,000,000 worth of so-called agricultural products, or about half the figure for 1929. Those who attack the trade-agreements program would have the country believe that these imports mean that American farmers have lost that much of their home market. Never was a more palpable and insidious falsehood perpetrated on our farm people.

None of the self-styled friends of the farmer will ever say that about 60 percent of the so-called agricultural products imported into this country during 1939, or about $755,000,000, were products which even the authors of the Hawley-Smoot tariff considered so incapable of displacing our own farm production and so indispensable for our people that they were largely left on the free list in the Tariff Act of 1930. What farmer was hurt by the $181,000,000 of rubber we brought in during that period, or by the $140,000,000 of coffee, or by $121,000,000 of raw silk? Or by the $29,000,000 of bananas, the $28,000,000 of cocoa beans, the $26,000,000 of carpet wool, or the $21,000,000 of tea? As a matter of fact, a large proportion of these products are consumed by our farm population. Their standard of living is raised by such consumption.

The products comprised in the remaining 40 percent of agricultural imports are of two general types: First, commodities of which we do not produce enough for our domestic requirements, notwithstanding we have for years imposed and still today impose high tariffs on most of them; and, second, products which we import because of special quality or use, or differences in marketing season, or other special considerations. These imports do not displace—they supplement—our deficient domestic supplies.

Those who are responsible for laying unwarranted stress on farm imports claim that these limited importations are materially hurtful to American agriculture. It seems to me as a plain business proposition that if the farmers had been hurt it would be reflected in farm income. That is the real test for every farmer. Let us look at the record.

By 1932, after 2½ years of Hawley-Smoot tariff embargoes, farm cash income had fallen to $4,500,000,000. By 1938, after 4 years of trade-agreement policy, it had risen to $7,500,000,000, excluding benefit payments. Were farmers hurt by this $3,000,000,000 increase in farm income?

The income to the dairy industry declined from $1,800,000,000 in 1929 to $991,000,000 in 1932, but it rose under our trade program to $1,400,000,000 in 1938. Does that indicate injury?

The income to the cattle industry fell from $1,500,000,000 in 1929 to $620,000,000 in 1932, but it rose again under our trade program to $1,100,000,000 in 1938. Does this indicate ruin?

What farmer was hurt by the increase in the average farm price of wheat from 39 cents in 1932 to 66 cents in 1938? What was injurious about the increase in the farmers' price on corn from 28 cents in 1932 to 49 cents in 1938?

If experience is any teacher at all, it should have taught everyone of us that farmers cannot be saved by embargo tariffs. It is politically impossible to grant tariff embargoes to some groups and withhold them from others.

On January 13, 1940, there appeared an editorial in the Evansville (Ind.) Press which I think is worth reading at this point:

GUARANTEE TO CURE OR KILL—OF ALL THE FAKE POLITICAL NOSTRUMS EVER PEDDLED THE AMERICAN FARMER THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF IS DOUBTLESS THE PHONIEST

After that last big war the farm-the-farmer lobbyists and politicians sold the Fordney-McCumber tariff as the sure cure for all rural aches and pains. The result was the foreign countries which had been buying our cotton, wheat, corn, hogs, cattle, etc., started growing their own and buying elsewhere. They had to because their sales in our markets having been restricted by the higher tariff rates, they couldn't get the dollars to buy as many American farm products. And, incidentally, they couldn't get enough dollars to pay the debts they owed to and in the United States.

An effort was made to remedy that by lending more dollars abroad, which was a good racket while it lasted. The twenties boomed along, farmers sold more to borrower-customers abroad, and farm prices here rose to a point where—while by no means on a parity with industrial prices—they were at least attractive enough to induce foreign farm products to start scaling our tariff walls. In 1929 about 10 percent of the farm products sold in this country were imported.

So the lobbyists and politicians started their medicine show again. Their new concoction bore the label of Smoot-Hawley, and was guaranteed to cure the tuberculosis, cancer, lumbago, and gout of the Farm Belt, and give American farmers a monopoly on the American market. It almost made good on that latter claim, but in so doing it knocked in the head the farmer's foreign markets, far more important to him than a domestic monopoly. Though by 1932 there was scarcely a trickle of farm imports, that fact did little good for our farmers who got 5 cents for their cotton, 10 cents for corn, and "two bits" for wheat.

Came then F. D. R. and the New Deal, Cordell Hull and the reciprocal-trade agreements, each year recapturing a little more of those lost foreign markets. And farm prices rising to a point where—while still not up to parity—they are attractive enough to have caused farm imports to rise from a trickle to a small stream. Of course most of our so-called farm imports consist of such products as bananas, rubber, coffee, tea, raw silk, cacao beans, and babassu nuts—but you can't expect politicians to mention that, at least not in an election year. They will talk about the 10,000,000 acres which could be cultivated, replacing the imports. They won't mention the 40,000,000 acres that would be put out of production if we lost our exports.

Once again the farmers of farmers, who pitch their medicine tents in the lobbies of Washington, are crying out the old quack cure. They want to abolish the Hull reciprocal-trade traeatment, persuade the patient to take a suck out of the same old protective-tariff bottle. Is there a farmer in the audience who, having taken that "cure" twice, still has enough strength to step forward and give a testimonial?

The case for trade agreements, it seems to me, comes down to the simple proposition that by reducing excessive and unreasonable tariff barriers and inducing other countries to do likewise, thus permitting a healthy growth of mutually advantageous trade, we greatly enlarge the purchasing power and the market outlets for our farm and other surpluses, both at home and abroad, to the benefit of American agriculture, American industry, and American labor. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON of Florida. Mr. Chairman, this administration all during its existence has subsidized the farmer, paid him not to produce, paid him benefit payments, parity payments, and so on. I will take my share of the guilt for all those votes. I voted on every occasion for benefit payments and for every assistance that smacked of helping the farmer. I did it then as a nonpolitical move. I now take the same position as a nonpolitical move, but my ox is being gored. I wonder if the farmer friends will help me now. I am one four hundred and thirty-fifth of this Congress, and I am doing just what every man in this House is doing, trying to help those who have chosen us to come here, and as a Floridian I object seriously to the reciprocal-trade treaties.

By subsidizing our farmers we have lowered their buying power by paying them not to produce, and so forth. Their income has been less, of necessity, because their peak production has not been enjoyed. The reciprocal-trade treaties now attempt to subsidize foreign producers by letting them compete with the American markets, thereby raising the foreigner's buying power. We lower our own buying power and raise the buying power of the foreign producers by the same operation. It does not make sense.

We cannot buy here or abroad without buying power. If we give up our own buying power and market in the interest of good will, we are paying a foolish price for trade with foreign countries. We try to raise our living standards, of course, and we think that we pay the highest wages of any country in existence, and we do, to our workers and wage earners; yet we put certain of our States in direct competition with countries that are not interested in paying high wages, countries that we know pay just a pittance to their workers, enabling them barely to exist. My State of Florida is materially prejudiced by this practice.

The United States must be considered as a whole.

If therefore the reciprocal trade treaty program hurts any State within these United States, how can it be said that any benefit is gained? It cannot be a benefit to this country as a whole if the traffic and trade and the commercial activity of any one State is virtually destroyed. That again is what we are doing to Florida.

The facts and figures are well known to every man and woman in this House. We all know how Florida and certain other sections are suffering. The facts have been presented on every occasion to every committee of the House, including the Committee on Ways and Means, and to the Committee on Reciprocity Information, a year ago by me.

This matter is political, but as far as agriculture is concerned I am nonpolitical. It is nothing but a political fight. If this program must be carried on, it appears to me that as concerns those States, including my own State of Florida, that are engaged in producing competitive commodities, if the proponents of this measure would admit that a cost-of-production amendment would be feasible, then you would not hurt certain of our States. If the tariff in question were designed to protect Florida and her cost of production of the competitive commodities insofar as Cuba is concerned much less suffering would result.

You cannot assist the United States, as such, and hurt or destroy the agricultural market in any one of its States. It just cannot be done and, again, we do not know in the future what the international situation will be. If we keep on raising the income, nationally, by our agricultural concessions to those foreign countries, who can tell me now when we again arrive at that crisis in our international life where those countries abroad will be found? Those who have benefited by the sacrifices we have made?

Buying power is what the farmer needs and that is what the American citizen needs. If you impair it or if you destroy it you have done nothing except to brand us all as a lot of fools, in my opinion.

If the Government, through the State Department and through this administration, on the one hand attempts to make sacrifices and to destroy the buying powers of our farmers and give it to foreign countries, and on the other hand, in the same breath or with the same thought, raises the buying power of foreign countries, by these foolish and unfair reciprocal-trade treaties, what have we accomplished? It appears to me to be economical suicide. It is wholly inconsistent, because if you destroy our buying power you cannot buy here or abroad. I therefore vigorously oppose this "fool's gold" program as respects the Florida-Cuba treaty. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to join with the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee and others, in paying a deserved tribute to our great Secretary of State, my distinguished fellow citizen of Tennessee, the Honorable Cordell Hull. It was my privilege to serve with him here as a Member of this body before he was elected to the Senate. As you know, he served with great credit and distinction as a Member of this body for some 22 years, about 18 years of that time as a member of the Ways and Means Committee. I feel that he not only deserves a place as one of the greatest statesmen this Nation has ever produced but, today, he stands out in bold relief as one of the foremost statesmen of the entire world. [Applause.]

My good friend, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, has honored me by suggesting that I devote at least a part of the time allotted to me to a discussion of the legal and constitutional question involved in the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act.

COSTITUTIONALITY OF TRADE-AGREEMENTS ACT

There is neither the time nor is there any necessity for my attempting to review in detail the constitutional question. There is not the necessity for such a review because I am confident that all those who are willing to be convinced have been entirely satisfied that there is in fact no real question concerning the constitutionality of the trade-agreements act. And as for the shortness of the time available to me, I doubt if that really makes very much difference because I am sure that even if I had 10 days to speak on this subject rather than 10 minutes, I could not make any progress with those Members who would vote against this act even if it had been written by the Supreme Court itself.

For the benefit of all members, however, I want to say that the constitutional question has been given the most attentive consideration by the Committee on Ways and Means each time the act has been before us. I speak from personal knowledge when I assure you that this question received our best attention. Our concern in this question is necessarily deeper than that of persons who, while voicing constitutional objections, are in fact opposed to the legislation regardless of its constitutionality. Moreover, recognizing that this is a matter which involves our contractual obligations with many other nations as well as our domestic law, we have felt an especial concern that there should be no reasonable doubt on this question. I do not claim to possess the same superhuman qualities as an infallible prophet on constitutional questions, as some Members have done from time to time—frequently, however, they subsequently found themselves in disagreement with the Supreme Court on the same matter. I do say emphatically, however, that the majority members of the committee were entirely convinced that this act stands squarely within the bounds of the Constitution as laid down both by court decisions and the long-established and unquestioned practices of the Congress from the earliest days of the Nation.

Only two constitutional issues have been raised: First, that the act involves an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power, and secondly, that trade agreements are treaties which must be ratified by two-thirds of the Senate. I think it is very important for us in considering the precedents to keep in mind that these two issues are separate and distinct. A great deal of confusion has been caused, whether intentionally or not I am not sure, by scrambling up the issues and the precedents. On the one hand, some minority members at the hearings would attempt to distinguish direct decisions and precedents on the delegation issue by stating that those cases did not involve international agreements, while other members who asserted that there were no precedents for not submitting trade agreements to the Senate as "treaties" attempted to avoid the square application of precedents such as the reciprocity agreements made under section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 without Senate ratification. I repeat, they tried to avoid and distinguish such square Republican precedents on the treaty issue by offering the utterly irrelevant distinction that section 3 of the Dingley Act specified the items and rates to be covered in the agreements.

The question of specifying particular items and rates may have a bearing on the delegation issue, but it has absolutely no bearing on the treaty issue. And, conversely, when we are talking about the delegation issue, it is worse than ridiculous to attempt to distinguish pertinent cases by saying that they did not involve international agreements. I hope I have made this fundamental point clear. It is really a very simple one, but it is also an essential one if we are to understand the force of the authorities and precedents which support the Trade Agreements Act on these two separate constitutional issues.

I cannot attempt to review the many decisions and precedents which were carefully considered in 1934 when this act was originally enacted, nor shall I attempt to go into the details of the recent decisions of the Supreme Court which have reaffirmed the soundness of the conclusion which we reached in 1934. These authorities are all to be found in the records of the three hearings which have been held by the Committee on Ways and Means and the two hearings previously held by the Senate Finance Committee on this act. I shall simply state for the benefit of those Members who have not had an opportunity to make an exhaustive examination of this matter for themselves that on the delegation of power issue there are precedents going back to 1794 which show that throughout the entire course of the Nation's history Congress has delegated to the President broad discretionary powers in the regulation of foreign commerce. It is not necessary for Members to take my word for this. Permit me to read to you what the Supreme Court of the United States said in 1936 in the case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (229 U. S. 304, 324):

Practically every volume of the United States Statutes contains one or more acts or joint resolutions of Congress authorizing action by the President in respect of subjects affecting foreign relations, which either leave the exercise of the power to his unrestricted judgment or provide a standard far more general than that which has always been considered requisite with regard to domestic affairs.

So far as I have been able to discover—and I am sure that I am right on this—there has never been a single successful challenge in our courts to any of these acts. On the contrary, there are numerous decisions by the Supreme Court squarely rejecting such challenges and upholding the power of Congress to invoke the assistance of the Executive in dealing with these peculiarly difficult and delicate problems which touch and sometimes go to the very heart of our foreign relations.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COOPER. No; I prefer not to yield.

I shall simply refer to three of the leading cases which I believe, taken together, make it clear beyond any reasonable doubt that there is no improper delegation of legislative power in the Trade Agreements Act. Field v. Clark (143 U. S. 649 (1892)) involved an unsuccessful attack on the McKinley Tariff Act of 1890 on both the delegation-of-power and treaty issues; Hampton v. United States (276 U. S. 394 (1928)) established the constitutionality of the so-called flexible-tariff provisions of the Tariff Act of 1922, whereby Congress delegated to the President the authority to modify tariff rates within a 50-percent range; and United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corporation (299 U. S. 304 (1936)), where the Supreme Court in unequivocal terms upheld the power of Congress to delegate broad discretion to the Executive in matters which concern the regulation of our foreign commerce.

It ought not to be necessary, but perhaps it is desirable, to say again that the Trade Agreements Act is one of the most important measures which this Congress has ever enacted in carrying out its plenary power to regulate our foreign commerce. The situation in the world today and for the past 10 years has been such that our responsibility to regulate effectively our foreign commerce called for setting up a procedure which could protect and foster our overseas trade. The Congress would simply be helpless to provide effective regulation of our foreign commerce under these circumstances if it could not establish some procedure which would enable us to deal with and control foreign tariffs and trade barriers as well as our own.

In the Hampton case the Supreme Court upheld the power of Congress to invoke the assistance of the Executive by delegating to him power to change our tariff rates within a 50-percent limit pursuant to the principle of equalizing costs of production in foreign commerce. During recent years the situation of world trade was such that it was imperative for Congress to administer quickly and effectively to that other equally important aspect of commerce—namely, distribution. Chief Justice Taft recognized the realities involved when he said in the Hampton case that—I quote:

In determining what it [the Congress] may do in seeking assistance from another branch [the executive], the extent and character of that assistance must be fixed according to common sense and the inherent necessities of governmental coordination.

The realistic rule laid down in the Hampton case for deciding these questions was stated as follows—I quote:

If Congress shall lay down by legislative act an intelligible principle to which the person or body authorized to fix such rates is directed to conform, such legislative action is not a forbidden delegation of legislative power.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. No. I prefer not to yield now. I regret my time is very limited.

I submit that the principle on which the Trade Agreements Act rests, of bargaining open foreign channels of distribution and markets in aid of American producers, is an "intelligible principle" which accords with "common sense and the inherent necessities of the governmental coordination," to use the authoritative words of Chief Justice Taft. I cannot attempt to discuss in detail the underlying limitations and policies prescribed in this act, but I can refer any Members who are interested to a very full exposition of this aspect in an article by Francis B. Sayre, in volume 39 of the Columbia Law Review, entitled "The Constitutionality of the Trade Agreements Act." So much for the delegation-of-power issue.

On the second issue—namely, whether the trade agreements must be submitted for ratification by two-thirds of the Senate—the precedents and authorities are equally conclusive. Again I can say that the precedents go back to the early days of the Republic. The various international agreements concluded by this Government without Senate ratification number at least 1,000. These agreements dealt with a variety of matters, and many of them, like the present trade agreements, were concluded pursuant to congressional authorization.

Since 1792 the Congress has exercised its important powers in connection with the regulation of our foreign mails by delegating certain powers to the Executive and invoking his assistance in carrying out congressional policy through the negotiation of executive agreements with other nations. In 1890 Chief Justice Taft, then Solicitor General, upheld the power of Congress to authorize the Postmaster General to adhere to international postal conventions without Senate ratification. A similar statute stands on our books today.

As I mentioned earlier in my remarks, the reciprocal agreements negotiated pursuant to section 3 of the Dingley Tariff Act of 1897 constitute inescapable precedents on the treaty issue. Some 15 of these agreements were concluded, as expressly authorized by Congress, without Senate ratification. As I have said before, the argument that these agreements were different because the act prescribed the terms and rates to be dealt with in the agreements, is of absolutely no relevance on the treaty issue. These matters go only to the delegation issue, and in view of the ample authorities on this issue, there is no need to, and I do not, rely on these agreements as precedents on the delegation issue. I might simply add for the benefit of those who might otherwise overlook the fact, that the Dingley Act was a Republican measure.

Finally, as to the treaty issue it is highly significant that of all the Executive agreements which have been concluded, not one has ever been stricken down by the courts as being a violation of the treaty-making power. On the contrary, the Supreme Court itself on several occasions has expressly recognized the standing of such agreements concluded without Senate ratification. In the Curtiss-Wright decision, cited previously, the Supreme Court referred to "treaties, international understandings, and compacts," declaring that "the power to make such international agreements as do not constitute treaties in the constitutional sense," although not "expressly affirmed by the Constitution, nevertheless exist[s] as inherently inseparable from the conception of nationality." And in 1937, in United States v. Belmont (301 U. S. 324, 330), the Supreme Court again spoke unmistakably to the point when it stated in respect to certain Executive agreements concluded by this Government:

The assignment and the agreements in connection therewith did not, as in the case of treaties, as that term is used in the treaty-making clause of the Constitution (art. II, sec. 2), require the advice and consent of the Senate.

I have deemed it desirable to refer to the Curtiss-Wright and the Belmont decisions because both are highly pertinent pronouncements of the Supreme Court which had not been decided when the Trade Agreements Act was enacted in 1934. Both of these decisions strongly fortify the conclusion which we reached in 1934 on the basis of precedents and authorities then available; the Curtiss-Wright decision passes directly on the delegation of power issue and speaks directly to the treaty-making issue, while the Belmont case bears directly on the latter issue.

Three times now—first in 1934, then in 1937, and again in 1940—Congress has given these matters the conscientious consideration which any constitutional question requires. Both in 1937 and in 1940 the latest pertinent decisions of the Supreme Court have confirmed the soundness of our 1934 conclusion. I submit the time has come when we must accept the views of that Court as foreclosing the constitutional question as a subject for further debate. Let us, therefore, direct our attention, as the lawyers say, to the merits. I think we will find the record equally conclusive on that score.

It was to be hoped that this broad national program, designed and intended to benefit all the people of this country, could be considered in its broad national aspects rather than from the standpoint of narrow, selfish interests, and that it might be free from partisan political consideration, but it has been demonstrated that such a hope could not be realized. It soon developed in the hearings on this resolution that the effort of the minority was to turn it into an old-time tariff fight.

On this resolution, as has been true in the consideration of previous measures related to the tariff, the two great political parties, as represented here, are definitely divided, the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee favoring the extension of the program and the minority members opposing it.

The Trade Agreements Act approved June 12, 1934, was in response to a message from the President of the United States recommending its passage. In 1937 it was extended for another period of 3 years. The pending resolution, No. 407, is for the purpose of extending it another 3 years and is likewise in response to a message of the President delivered in person at the beginning of this session of Congress, and it is a most important administration measure.

It might be interesting to remind ourselves of some of the reasons existing in 1934 for the adoption of this program. An analysis of our foreign trade showed that the total exports of the United States fell from $5,241,000,000 in 1929 to $1,675,000,000 in 1933, while the imports fell from $4,399,000,000 in 1929 to $1,449,000,000 in 1933. The decline in American commerce had steadily continued. The important point was that in this great shrinkage of world trade we were not only losing in the same proportion as other nations but we were losing at a greater rate than other countries. Many of the markets we were then losing, of course, were being taken by other countries. Under our arrangement and under conditions as they then existed, we were not able to hold our own in world trade.

So, in self-defense and as a matter of common sense, it was necessary for us to at least try to improve this situation. Therefore, the trade-agreements program was adopted. Now, let us look to the record to see what has actually happened. Twenty-two trade agreements have been made. Twenty of them are now in effect, covering 60 percent of our foreign trade. Of course, the Czechoslovakian agreement was abrogated and the agreement with Nicaragua was terminated.

Total exports of the United States increased from $2,208,000,000 in 1934 and 1935, average, to $3,136,000,000 in 1938 and 1939, average, or an increase of 42 percent, while the general imports increased from $1,851,000,000 in 1934 and 1935, average, to $2,139,000,000 in 1938 and 1939, average, or an increase of 16 percent.

Comparing January to November for the 2 years, 1938 and 1939, with the corresponding months of the pre-trade-agreement years, 1934 and 1935, few agreements having gone into effect before 1936, the figures show an increase of 60.5 percent in exports to trade-agreement countries and of only 29.6 percent to nonagreement countries.

I also invite attention to the fact that many concessions have been obtained through these trade agreements. Concessions have been obtained on at least 3,000 items or rates in the tariff schedule of the foreign countries with which agreements are in effect. Almost one-third of our total exports to all countries have been the subject of concessions. Reductions in tariffs, liberalization of quotas, bindings of existing customs treatment, and other concessions have been secured for almost three-fourths of our total agricultural exports to the agreement countries, and for nearly half of our nonagricultural exports to the same countries. I emphasize the fact that of the concessions received by this country from the other countries of the world with which we have negotiated these agreements, the concessions for agricultural products have exceeded the concessions for nonagricultural products. And it will be remembered that one of the main purposes of this program was to benefit agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. And in any agreement we make with another country, if that country makes an agreement with some other country and gives the same concessions between the United States and that country where the duty, for example, is lower to the third country, we automatically get the benefit of that.

Mr. COOPER. The gentleman is correct, and since the gentleman has raised that point, I shall give some pertinent figures on that point. That is with respect, of course, to the application of the most-favored-nation treatment. Let it be remembered that Chief Justice Hughes, while Secretary of State, in 1922, under a Republican administration, is the man who started the unconditional most-favored-nation policy. It was put into effect by him in 1923, and has continued as the policy of this Government from that time down to now.

I call attention to a few very pertinent facts in that connection. About a year or so ago a special study was made by the State Department and the Tariff Commission of the generalization of concessions and also the other side of the question. Those investigations showed that the generalizations that we made with all the other countries amounted to $30,000,000 in trade. On the other hand, by that very generalization policy, we protected $250,000,000 worth of our export trade. The ratio stands $9 of benefits that we have received for every $1 of concessions that we have granted. In my part of the country when you trade on a basis of getting benefits 9 to 1, it is considered pretty good trading.

The attempt to criticize Secretary Hull by charging that he has changed his position from that expressed in 1929 to the effect that the so-called flexible-tariff provisions of the Tariff Acts of 1922 and 1930 were unwise, unsound, and unconstitutional has absolutely no basis for at least three reasons. First, the decisions of the courts during the years prior to 1934 sustained the validity of the flexible provisions, and these decisions are equally applicable to the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act. Second, instead of normal conditions as in 1929 and previous years, a business collapse, unprecedented in all history in its dislocating, disruptive, and chaotic effects, presented an unprecedented emergency which called for emergency treatment by an emergency governmental agency, and hence the reciprocal trade agreements program was inaugurated. Third, it has been definitely and authoritatively stated by the sponsors of this trade program since 1934 that, notwithstanding, the court decisions sustained every basic feature of the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act, it was only being proposed as a temporary emergency agency to deal with terrific abnormal economic conditions, so that as soon as these were sufficiently improved or cured, Congress would be in a position, and also in a better position, to deliberate at any length in the formulation of a permanent policy of tariff making and trade promotion.

Another point to which I want to call attention is that the earlier agreements, which mostly went into effect in 1935 and 1936, have shown definitely encouraging results, according to the statement of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace, as he pointed out in the hearings that agricultural exports to the 16 countries with which trade agreements were in effect throughout the fiscal year 1938–39 showed an increase in that year of 15 percent over the fiscal year 1935–36, while agricultural exports to all other countries showed a decrease in the same period of 19 percent.

With respect to cattle, about which we have heard so much here, the gross income of the cattle industry, which stood at $635,000,000 in 1932, was in 1938, $1,165,000,000. And the average farm price of beef in 1932 was $4.25 a hundred; in 1938, $6.56 a hundred; and in the first 11 months of 1939, $6.87 a hundred.

Reference has been made frequently to agriculture and some increase in recent agricultural imports. To be fair, it should be pointed out that in 1939, of the increase of agricultural imports to this country, 70 percent is accounted for by commodities not produced in this country at all—crude rubber, coffee, tea, raw silk, and raw cocoa. The remaining 30 percent of increase is largely accounted for by increased imports of industrial raw materials, such as wool, mohair, hides, and skins, products on which there has been no reduction in duty and of which the imports supplement the domestic production.

Many of you are intensely interested in agriculture, as I am, coming from an agricultural district. I invite your attention to the hearings, and especially to the statements of Secretary Wallace and Mr. O'Neal, both of whom have given a lifetime of devoted service to the cause of agriculture, and have done so much for the American farmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.
